"Don't be afraid," said the Agent with the blunt frankness of perfect familiarity. "You're only feeling natural."

"I hope it isn't catechin'," said the Expressman. "But I gathered from your remarks that you wasn't feelin' overly good yourself after that sermon. And I been contagiously close to you."

When Howard reached the parsonage he was met at the door by his sister, who had not waited for him to come over.

She cried, as she put her arms about him. Roy and his wife were close behind him, joining her in her congratulations and happy if tearful emotion.

"Now then, folks," Howard was saying as he laughingly lifted his sister and put her on the dining-room table, "I'm awful hungry. Put something as good as this on the festive board and I'll eat it."

HE was as happy as a boy except for that inward memory of the people's lack of faith in his own word, but he could set that aside, and did so when the meal was ready and they were together at the table.

"It was wonderful, old man," Roy said. "I knew you could preach, but I had no idea you could give it to 'em so hard."

"Was it too hard?"

"No. Not if they deserved it. But I supposed, Kate and I both, that Red Hill was an ideal place. We had no—"

"It is an ideal place to preach in," said Howard, interrupting cheerfully, "because the people need converting so bad. I never knew how bad until this morning."

"I feel specially interested in that girl in the choir," said Mrs. Lennox earnestly. "I have seen faces like hers in New York on Fifth Avenue. Why, she is a New York chorus girl type! How queer she should be living out here in this little town!"

Howard and Rose looked at each other.

"We have noted that," said Rose. And she went on to give Kate some of Inez's history. Mrs. Lennox expressed more and more interest.

"A girl like that ought to live in a big city. She will never develop in this little place," Mrs. Lennox spoke with the keen sense of a woman of wide observation, and her next remark revealed her deep interest in Inez as a human creature who had attracted her sympathy.

"Roy," she said, "why couldn't we take that girl back to New York with us and help her develop in her own atmosphere?"

"We could," said Roy, who admired his wife and respected her as well as loved her. "But how do you know she would come? You speak of it as if she were a sunflower we could pick, or a souvenir we could get at the drug store."

"No!" Rose spoke up eagerly, glancing at her brother. "There is a reasonable possibility that she would go. I tell you. Talk with Miss Burton about Inez. She knows her better than any one else. Poor girl! She hasn't any mother or sister. I don't know what her future will be here if she stays in Red Hill."

"Say!" said Roy, with sudden enthusiasm, "there's a schoolma'am for you. If I wasn't married already or was a Mormon—Howard, how are you going to tell the schoolma'am you are much obliged? I'd like to be present—"

FOR the first time since he had known him Roy Lennox felt an embarrassment in Howard's look as he sat there facing him across the table. He seemed uneasy, and did not reply even with a smile or his old familiar grin, and Roy felt his wife's foot gently pressing against his under the table.

"I'll talk with Miss Burton and Miss Clark too," Mrs. Lennox said. "I feel very certain we could, Roy and I, set that girl into the right place in New York and help her. She is one of the sort that cannot get through life without help, and somehow this morning as I

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation

"I'll Back Up Every Word of It"

That Willard advertisement in your local newspaper can't give you the full realization of the dependability of Willard Service, or of the Still Better Willard with Threaded Rubber Insulation.

Don't be satisfied with just reading about them. Come down to the service station and get acquainted with the real man and the real battery back of the printed page.

You already know the superior insulating quality of hard rubber, how it offers better, more durable protection to battery plates than any other material.

But there's a very interesting story about the way Willard was the first to make rubber insulation really practical on automobile starting and lighting batteries.

Let me tell you about it face to face, and also give you some valuable suggestions on prolonging battery life.

Meantime, write the Willard Storage Battery Company, Cleveland, Ohio, for their free booklet, A-1, "196,000 Little Threads," and a list of Willard Service Station addresses.

"To Make Uniform Tires
the Workmen Must Be Uniform
First"

Chain-Like in Uniformity Are Miller Tires and Men

Seventy per cent. of all tires produced in the United States are made in Akron, Ohio. Here motorists know more than the average about rubber, fabrics and tire building methods.

Here the Miller regiment of champion tire builders first became famous.

Mark why this preponderance of favor for Miller Tires—among those qualified to judge.

Tires 99% Excellent

First because of Miller stabilized mileage. Because these tires—99 in 100—outrun standard guarantees.

So Miller Tires are known as Uniform Tires. And Miller Tire-builders are known as world champions.

These men average 95% efficient. The tires they build are 99% excellent.

That means that less than 1% ever need adjustment.

Miller Uniform Tires are something new—the crowning tire achievement.

The factors they bring—that is, uniform mileage—makers have sought to attain for years.

Miller achieved it by training crack squads to build uniformly.

And Miller Tires are Geared-To-The-Road.

Their rubber cogs prevent the wheels from slipping when you start. And they make all roads safer by resisting the tendency to skid.

Prepare for a Shortage

Few workmen can be trained to the Miller perfection. So at the best we won't be able to supply more than one motorist in fifty this year.

And only strong dealers are authorized to sell them.

To get Uniform Tires, find the Miller dealer in your neighborhood and speak for your season's needs at once.

Miller Cord Tires are extra capacity, extra resilient and extra strong. Fine, big, good looking and longer wearing than the regulation type and less expensive on a basis of mileage.

sat looking at her lovely face up there, I seemed to feel like a big sister to her, and to know I could help her."

"It would be a great thing for her if you could," said Howard, and an inward sigh of relief from an invisible burden escaped him.

He spent the afternoon following the Sunday school session in getting ready for the evening service, a deepening feeling in his spirit that the results he was praying for were going to be manifest. But not even his own sanguine hopes had anticipated the reality.

The morning service had cleared the way for it. The Spirit had been moving all through that dramatic event. Howard himself had always believed in spiritual realities and lived in the happy normal healthy atmosphere of them himself. But as he came out of the parsonage that evening and started across the yard to be on hand to welcome the other ministers and the people, he was startled to observe that the seats were already filled, although it was only seven o'clock.

HE went up on the little platform and found that Miss Burton had already come over and her young people were present ready for the chorus. It was no place for him to say what he wanted, and she seemed to understand. She was as calm and undisturbed as usual.

There was not a word about the morning, and it did not seem necessary.

He greeted Brother Gray, who had just arrived. Harris, the Presbyterian man, was to preach. The ministers as they came up met him with great heartiness. The atmosphere was vastly different from that of the Sunday evening before. And over all the place a quiet brooded that was new to Red Hill.

It had known the usual evangelistic campaigns and had grown more or less callous to protracted meetings and special revival services in the winter.

The idea that the Spirit of God might come and express his might without any advertising or printing or paid professional had never dawned on the church members of Red Hill. They had always been taught that revivals were mostly man-made, as if God were a hard being to please and had to be coaxed into a town or a church and enticed into a forgiving spirit before he would condescend to convert anybody or add to the church membership.

But tonight, before the first hymn was sung, Howard, with his sensitive soul keen to divine motion, felt the stirring of power over the people.

The night was still. The sky was clear. The hearts of Red Hill had been rebuked for a gross sin. The different congregations and their pastors were for the time at least leaning in sympathy and good will toward one another.

And when Howard rose to pray, a breath from heaven seemed to flow over the place. And Red Hill began to say to itself for the first time in its history, as it sat there under the prairie stars, "What if God should show himself to us in power this night?"

CHAPTER VIII

IT will not be easy to make the average person understand the rest of this story unless he understands the full meaning of the event that took place in Red Hill on the evening of the day that Red Hill was convicted of a sin and felt the coming in of the spiritual tide over its dry commonplaces of business, amusement, and man-made religion.

Red Hill had always prided itself on its high moral and educational standard. It compared itself with towns in Missouri and Oklahoma, to the disparagement of those towns. George Clark was fond of calling attention in the Red Hill Sun to the fact that the bank deposits in Red Hill were double those in the average Missouri town of the same size.

"We don't spend our money for booze," he said in an editorial boasting Red Hill. "We believe in being decent and civilized, and if anybody in Red Hill wants the saloon and cannot get along without it we advise him to move to Kansas City and fill up on beer and whisky until he has enough. But we don't spend our money for booze."

And it was true Red Hill did not spend its money for booze, neither did it spend it for anything else in comparison with the amount it put into the bank and had to spend. The country around Red Hill was rich and prosperous. Farms were worth anywhere from $150 to $200 an acre. The bank in Red Hill received deposits of over $650,000 a year, and most of this money lay in the two banks drawing interest on long time. Red Hill had prided itself on its churches, schools, and public improvements. Yet it did not pay any of its preachers over $900 a year and rent of a parsonage, and there was not a library or a rest room or a drinking fountain or place for boys to spend time in the evening except Jake Seymour's movie, which was of very questionable value educationally or ethically. As a matter of fact Red Hill was a Pharisae, hypocritical little town, and was crudely unconscious of the fact. This does not mean that there were no good people in Red Hill. It only means that a town can exist in Kansas minus a saloon and a house of vice and a gambling den, and at the same time be minus also any positive righteousness that pervades the community.

IT is necessary to say these plain and uncomplimentary things about Red Hill in order that we may understand the need of regenerating and living forces for the self-satisfied, self-centered population. Add to all that has been said, that no one for years, including the churches, had made any attempt to touch the farming interest around the town, and the rural conditions were, as Howard discovered later on, simply astonishing, not for any depraved conditions morally, but for a condition of absolute apathy so far as religious enthusiasm is concerned. There was a number of farmers educated in the country college, men and women, but they were seldom seen in church, and had no special interest in Red Hill except as a place for shipping out grain and stock. One of these college-bred farmers said to Howard when he began to go out and make his social survey of the county:

"Why should I go to listen to a man preach who can get only $800 a year and who offends every instinct I possess with his century-old theology and his insufferable prayers? Why should I spend my time going to a slow, uninteresting religious service that has no vital connection with real life, when I can come in contact with the best minds of the world through my books and magazines? And why should I endure the crude efforts of a church choir when I can hear the masters of music with my victrola or my Edison?"

Howard looked at this man as a new specimen.

"Would you go to church if there was a $2,500 man in the pulpit instead of an $800 one?"

The college farmer looked at Howard as if he were a new specimen.

"I might. But Red Hill can never get such a preacher. It can never get above $800 or $900."

"How about going to church to worship God instead of being mentally pleased with intellectual sermons and entertained with professional music? How does that strike you?" Howard said with blunt cheerfulness.

The college agriculturist got red in the face as the point was obvious, and for a moment he looked angry. Then he laughed.

"I see the point all right. You don't have to twist it around as well as jab it in. But I don't mind saying frankly, I'm not a good enough Christian to stand for that. I need the accessories of worship to make it agreeable to me. My wife is the same."

"In other words, you are an educated man making money out of God's earth, and you don't have enough real religion to worship God in a church unless the service is intellectually and musically entertaining to you. And you are perfectly willing to spend $200 on a new piece of farm machinery to help you raise more crops to make more dollars, but you are not willing to give $20 a year to help improve the cultivating of the religious field around Red Hill. I wonder if that is education?"

Howard said it all with astonishing bluntness and left the young farmer staring at him, with clenched fists and angry eyes. And yet before the young preacher was out in the road, the college-bred farmer was asking himself when he had been preached to in that fashion, and being clear-headed enough to make a just estimate, he acknowledged, as he slowly went into the house, that the new minister might be right and something in his own definition of religion might be wrong.

All this occurred some time after that Sunday night when the Spirit of God breathed on Red Hill, but it is mentioned here to show the conditions that existed—conditions that nothing short of an upheaval in men's life-long definitions could change or improve.

AS that service went on, an atmosphere of other-worldliness began to envelop the audience. It was not due to anything in the service itself, certainly not to the sermon. The Rev. George Harris, who was the preacher of the evening, had not had any long or varied experience as a sermonizer. His sermon tonight smelled of the seminary, and the careful work of the professor of homiletics, who had a rule for sermons which was like a recipe for pie or brown bread. The Rev. Mr. Harris stirred in the ingredients with a careful hand, measuring out the proper quantity for the different parts, and then with anxious eye he watched it to see that it didn't burn or fall. He was more concerned over the sermon than over the audience, which is generally fatal to the audience. But the sermon is saved, like a successful surgical operation where the patient dies. But he was blandly unconscious of the fact, and did his best, not being used to such a crowd, and feeling somewhat embarrassed by his nearness to it, for the pulpit in his own building was carefully removed a respectful distance from the first pew of human beings, and sometimes there was no one in the first pew.

Somewhat that night the sermon seemed to be mercifully detached from its surroundings. Something bigger than any sermon had seized Red Hill. It was under the spell of a divine breath that blew out of God's scented gardens, and the people sat in perfect silence, not listening to the sermon, but to another voice that spoke to them out of the silences of God, a voice they had not heard nor heeded through all the years.

And the first outward sign of that presence came right after Howard's prayer. By some merciful arrangement of the parts of the service Howard prayed immediately at the close of the sermon. If you have ever gone from a room in some vulgar rich man's house where every corner is crowded with bric-a-brac and every foot of floor space has some piece of furniture and every inch of wall some picture, into a room where the eye is gladdened and the mind refreshed by open spaces and the outline of two or three worth-looking-at objects instead of a clutter, you will understand the effect of Howard's quiet prayer after the sermon. Almost as if with a sigh of relief the people sat in a different attitude of quietness, and it was unbroken when the prayer ended.

THEN the silence was startled by a cry. It was a woman's voice—low, clear and repentant, confessing the sin of evil judging of others and calling for divine forgiveness. It was followed at once by others, men and women. It was noticeable that they did not rise, but sat with bowed heads, many of them speaking with muffled tones as if their hands were over their faces, or their tongues halted with sobs; and yet there was no superficial hysteria, no evidence of emotion that had been provoked by any man-made effort. It came—that real note of repentance—at first hand, without the mediation of a priest, as if the people had come face to face with God himself and needed no other avenue of approach to him, as indeed they had; and the four ministers sat there on the little platform, profoundly stirred over a new and unknown experience.

HOWARD was more prepared for it than the others, because his deep and sensitive spirit was always keyed up to God's approach; but even he was smitten into awe and wonder at what was going on there under the prairie stars. He could not help feeling his heart beat high with expectation, while at the same time he could not help wondering what the outcome of it all would be—what human direction the event would demand, whether the usual evangelistic appeal ought to be made.

He looked at Brother Noyes. There was a look of bewilderment on the elder man's face, as if he were at sea in the very matter that Howard was revolving. Brother Gray sat with his head bowed, his lips moving. Harris was looking first at the audience, then at Howard, as if in doubt over the whole affair, but deeply moved by it; as if wondering how such an unusual service should be closed, having never had any experience in closing a religious service other than by singing a hymn and pronouncing the benediction.

And at that point Agnes Burton began to sing. With the first note Howard's heart leaped up. He had been thinking of her through the day—her action in the morning service almost compelled it—and now she suddenly came into his mind again.

He did not know she could sing. She had not offered to do so any Sunday, but had asked Rose twice. Neither the deacon nor Mrs. Burton had ever mentioned such a gift—he wondered why, afterward—but she was singing now, the one song that such a service required; and as she went on, Howard was startled out of his usual calm judgment of himself, to find himself saying, "Of all the people here tonight she caught the one true note that ought to be sounded! What a help she would be in the ministry—in some man's life—in—"

He did not say "mine." He had not come that far yet, but it seemed to him that somehow the voice fitted in completely with one of his own deeply spiritual experiences, although he did not know music, and it did not generally affect him or move his spirit.

SHE sang, without accompaniment, in a quiet but sustained contralto, the hymn that Howard had once looked for in the church book and was disappointed not to find.

Breathe on me, Breath of God,
Fill me with life anew.
That I may love what thou dost love,
And do what thou wouldst do.

Breathe on me, Breath of God,
Until my heart is pure;
Until with thee I will one will,
To do or to endure.

Breathe on me, Breath of God,
Till I am wholly thine;
Till all this earthly part of me
Glow with thy fire divine.

Breathe on me, Breath of God;
So shall I never die,
But live with thee the perfect life
Of thine eternity.

Every head in the audience was bowed. It seemed to Howard as he looked past Agnes Burton out into the yard that many of the people were on their knees. And when the voice ceased, the night silence seemed filled with an unseen Presence that stole out of the sky and gently and lovingly and yet powerfully put out a Benediction with its nail-pierced hand, dismissing the people from the outward service into an inward consecration where a new life was going to mark the new birth of that hitherto narrow and selfish town.

The people rose by twos and threes and went home in silence. There was no noisy hand-shaking, no exchanging of neighborly greetings. They dispersed without a word, as if the spell of the night were on them and they wanted to get home and think it over.

Where Bubble Grains Seem at Home

Float in Milk

One expects to find Puffed Grains in surroundings like this. Airy, flaky, flavory—they seem to fit a dainty morning table.

But that is only one side of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. These are not mere food confections. They are whole-grain foods for one thing—almost complete foods. They are prepared in Prof. Anderson's scientific way.

Food Cells All Exploded

They are bubble grains, puffed to eight times size by millions of steam explosions. Every food cell has been blasted, so digestion can instantly act. Every granule is fitted to feed.

They are nut-like and flavory because of a fearful heat. They are flimsy and flaky because they are shot from guns. So every dainty quality has a hygienic reason.

Puffed Grains utilize the whole grain. There is no waste. They do not tax digestion, so they are all-hour foods. And every atom feeds.

Only three grains—wheat, rice and corn—are thus prepared for food. But these three grains should be served in puffed form often. No other form is so delightful, none so hygienic.

Mix with Fruit

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice
and Corn Puffs
Each 15c Except in Far West

In the morning serve like other cereals, or mix with any fruit. For luncheon or supper, serve in bowls of milk. They are crisp and toasted, and four times as porous as bread.

Use like nut meats on ice cream. Use as wafers in your soups. Salt or butter like peanuts or popcorn for children after school. What other food delight can you think of that's comparable with Puffed Grains? Use all three kinds.

How One Brave Woman Helped Poland

Mme. Paderewska's Wonderful Dolls Brought a Flood of Gold for Her Stricken Country

By ANNA M. L. PHILLIPS

I HAVE assisted Madame Helena Paderewska, wife of the famous pianist and composer, in the greatest war relief ever undertaken and accomplished by any one woman. Since the beginning of the world war, groups of women have achieved wonders, and to the glory of my sex be it said that through their hands has gone the deepest consolation, the most supreme assistance that can possibly be given to suffering humanity. But Madame Paderewska stands alone in her work "For Poland." And what she has accomplished, the good she has done, the help she has given, will make her name go down with that of her husband as patriot and philanthropist.

At the opening of the war Mr. Paderewski and the late Henryk Sienkiewicz, author of "Quo Vadis?" founded the Polish Victims' Relief Fund, with headquarters at Lausanne, Switzerland. The home of the Paderewskis, Rioud-Bosson, at Morges, on the banks of Lake Geneva, was turned into a relief camp, and until the present day it is the abiding-place, the shelter, the home of Polish refugees, whose former homes have been crushed out of existence under the war hoof.

AFTER organizing relief committees in Paris and London, Paderewski and his wife sailed for America. They arrived here early in May, 1915, and Mr. Paderewski immediately organized the National American Committee of the Polish Victims' Relief Fund. While on her way to America, Madame Paderewska visited her friend, Miss Mary Mickiewicz, the granddaughter of Poland's great poet, Adam Mickiewicz. Miss Mickiewicz has lived in Paris for many years, and her home has been the rendezvous of the Polish artists' colony, a large gathering of men and women, painters and sculptors of renown. The vicissitudes through which these people were called upon to pass appealed to Miss Mickiewicz, and Madame Paderewska, ever warm of heart, generous and ready to help the sufferers, suggested that the dolls these artists had turned to making, because there was no market for their pictures and marbles, be sent to her in America.

I shall never forget the day of the arrival of the first consignment at the rooms of the Polish Victims' Relief Fund in the Aeolian Building, New York. It was in August, 1915. Mr. Paderewski and Madame were in California, and when the box with its custom-house markings was opened it seemed to me I could hear the cries of the mothers and children in far-away Poland as I lifted the little puppets and placed them in a row. What a collection it was! Thirty-one dolls, the like of which had never been seen in America! Just thirty-one little rag dolls with jointed bodies, hair made of twine or cord or fur, as the case might be, and with the typical Polish peasant dress of the various provinces. The consignment came on Friday, and on Saturday afternoon the office of the Relief Fund was closed; but so fascinating had I found these little "Waifs of Poland," as I called them, that I went back to the office and wrote about them until twilight. The next day I went again and completed what has since become so well known as "Madame Paderewska's Doll Book." It seemed to me that text and jingles never came easier. Even then I felt that these little messengers from the suffering ones of Poland to the sympathetic girls and boys of America were destined to become famous.

I WAS not mistaken about their popularity. The first sale of Madame Paderewska's dolls occurred in Bar Harbor, at a lawn party given at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ernesto Fabbri. When she and her husband returned to New York, the little book had so fascinated Madame that she asked me to take hold of the matter and push the sale of the dolls, in order, as she said so truthfully, "to save the lives of my people." Then it was that the active campaign for the sale of "Madame Paderewska's Polish Refuge Dolls" took place.

We started in Boston with the sale at the Touraine, the Monday following Mr. Paderewski's Sunday concert at Symphony Hall, October 7, 1915. The management of the Touraine allowed us to put a table in the corner of the lobby to the left of the door, and there, from ten o'clock in the morning until six in the afternoon, Madame Paderewska sold dolls and distributed doll books and pamphlets concerning the work of the Polish Victims' Relief Fund. In the evening we had $1,200 from the day's sale. Since then we have sold in every city where Mr. Paderewski has given a concert. If the size of the town warranted, we conducted not only a sale after the concert, in the green room or in the lobby of the theater or hall where the concert took place, but we had an additional sale at the principal hotel. In Philadelphia we realized even more than in Boston. But the banner state for the sale of dolls, outside of New York, is California. The sale of dolls at the Cort Theater after the concert by Mr. Paderewski, October 1, 1915, amounted to over $800, the largest single after-concert sale we have ever had. And the small beginning of thirty-one dolls has merged itself into a business that has supported not only the artist doll-makers but the entire Polish refugee colony in Paris. This includes musicians, writers, wounded soldiers, the old and the helpless.

NOW, any one who thinks that packing dolls and unpacking them, arranging them into an attractive display at hotels and after concerts, is an easy proposition, should have been with us on some of our short stays while on Mr. Paderewski's concert tour. The dolls, while not breakable, must be handled carefully, in order to preserve their freshness and attractive appearance. The dresses never troubled Madame Paderewska half so much as the heads of the infants. "Be very careful and wrap the heads" was her injunction to any who assisted at the sales; and reams upon reams of tissue paper have been used to swathe the flaxen hair of Jan, the son of the gardener, and his little playmate Halka's golden-cropped tresses, and give them an appearance of neatness.

"I never loved a doll before; indeed, I never had one," said Madame Paderewska; "but these are real, they are human. They speak, they cry, they implore, they reach my heart; and I love my dolls better than any child ever has loved her pet plaything."

When the consignment was first opened, Mr. Paderewski selected as his favorite "Little Carrots," or "Zaza" as we named her—a little red-haired doll whose features were indicated by two pink patches for cheeks, a little stitch of embroidery for a mouth, and two brown polka-dots for eyes. Nobody but an artist could make such a doll, and it is Zaza that Mr. Paderewski keeps constantly on the piano on which he practices so assiduously. "She is not a doll; she has the soul of the artist who made her," the master often says; "I never tire of her. She is attentive and sympathetic, she sits still and is quiet. She interprets my music." And what Zaza is to Mr. Paderewski other dolls are to their possessors.

We have sold hundreds of Zazas and Jans and Halkas, and we found them the most popular of all the dolls, even though their coiffures were so difficult to keep in shape.

YET the sale of dolls and other articles consigned by the Polish Artists' Relief Colony was but a fraction of the work which Madame Paderewska has done for Poland. She has the keen analytic mind which grasps big situations and at the same time takes hold of detail. Since the opening of the war perhaps no other one woman has worked so indefatigably, so steadily, and so consistently for one single cause as the little black-haired Polish patriot whose slogan "Buy a doll and save a life" first put her into touch with the sympathetic women of America. Nor is her work completed. She has set about to establish a home for women and young girls in Warsaw, Poland, and it is to this object that she is now bending her energies.

"My girls!" she said in that sweet, plaintive, appealing tone. "Help me to help them. Don't let them go to destruction. Help me to found a home for them where they can be self-supporting."

And she is being helped, and ere long the thing will be an accomplished fact. When the war clouds pass and the work of building becomes possible, there will rise in Warsaw a home where these girls will have the love and protection of good women, and where they will be taught to become useful, helpful housekeepers, and to do their part in rehabilitating the home and business life of Poland.

On the Band Wagon at One Hundred and One

FEW people attain the age of 100 years; fewer, perhaps, live a continuous married life of 74 years, and hold church membership for 85 years; and still fewer who have passed the century mark are able to travel good distances with ease and comfort, to make a vigorous and lucid public talk, to walk to town at pleasure, and to look after a garden. Yet all these things, and more, are the experiences of the Rev. Philetus Beverly of Ottawa, Kansas.

At the beginning of the Mexican War Mr. Beverly was nearly 30 years of age, had been married 8 years, and was farming and preaching near the village of Chicago. He talks interestingly of making a trip down the Mississippi on a lumber raft in the 30's, of trekking from the state of New York, his birthplace, to Illinois in the year 1843, in an ox wagon, and of taking up a farm at Barrington, a few miles from Chicago, where he lived 24 years. He sold vegetables and other produce in Chicago when the village had no railroad and a population of only 500. After a quarter century of pioneering in Illinois, Mr. Beverly came on to Kansas, traveling overland in a covered wagon, for there was still no railroad in this direction. He settled at the village of Burlingame, where he has lived to the present, with the exception of a few years spent in Ottawa. For the past five years he has received wide attention and has been the subject of much newspaper comment in Kansas; his birthday has been a public event.

Mr. Beverly was born in Oxford, New York, February 11, 1817; was married there in 1833 to Miss Louisa Mix, who lived till 1907, when she was 93. These remarkable people, whose union endured approximately the allotted span of man's life, were the parents of 9 children, 4 of whom are still living, the youngest being above 70 years of age. Mr. Beverly has 64 living descendants. At the age of 100 years and 3 months, Rev. Mr. Beverly performed the marriage ceremony of one of his great-granddaughters.

Recently the First Methodist Church Sunday School of Ottawa arranged a service in honor of Mr. Beverly, and presented him with a silver loving cup.

The Human Interest of Havoline

Your dealer prefers to sell you Havoline because he's human. He's willing to shove any oil across the counter that you demand. But he much prefers to hand out Havoline.

Because he knows that Havoline Oil does everything for a car that it is scientifically possible for correct lubrication to do. He knows that a Havoline-oiled car will run more smoothly, last longer, need less repairing, and command a bigger cash value when trading-in time comes.

Your dealer has nothing to sell but service. He stands or falls on his ability to keep your car performing right. And he knows that correct lubrication of your car is his one best friend.

He knows that Havoline gives your car its one best chance to perform. That Havoline Oil gives a vast majority of the better class of motorists all the motor joy that modern horse-power is capable of delivering. That's the human interest of Havoline.

*Havoline greases are compounded of Havoline Oil and pure, sweet tallow.
Clean to handle and correct in body.*

Questions and Answers

C. B. Gresham, Ore. In Acts 13:10 the distinction is drawn between the children of the Kingdom and those of the wicked one, the latter as being the enemies of righteousness, per-verters of the truth, making it their business to do evil and to lead others astray. Knowing the truth, they oppose it with all the force of their nature, being inspired by the evil one, whose will they do from choice rather than from compulsion. The children of God are those who open their hearts to the truth and accept it, proving by words and deeds and by the purity of their lives and the sincerity of their faith that they are those whom Christ recognizes as his (Matt. 5:9; 15:26; John 1:12; Rom. 8:14-17; 9:8, etc.). It is nowhere implied that the children of darkness are so because it has been ordained. On the contrary, the light of divine truth is presented to all; but by resisting the appeal of truth—at first through carelessness or worldliness, or love of pleasure—the sinner ultimately becomes indifferent and hardened, and the spirit of evil finds him an easy conquest, giving ready response to any suggestions of wickedness. For any one, whether preacher or layman, to claim that all alike are children of God is to speak in direct contradiction of the truth as Jesus himself declared it. The Gospel invitation, however, is equally open to all men, and even the most hardened sinner, by sincere repentance, confession of sin and acceptance of Christ as Saviour, can obtain forgiveness and become a child of God.

Any reader of this paper knowing the present address of Florence Grace Berner, aged seventeen, will confer a favor by sending word to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Berner, Alcester, S. D.

A reader in Harbor Beach, Mich., sends us this note, which may prove serviceable to churches that are suffering from fuel shortage:
"Last Sunday Dr. Moffet, pastor of the Baptist church, announced to his congregation that the Ladies' Society had bought two acres of timber, just outside the corporation, and would expect the men to be on hand Monday morning, bright and early, each armed with a good sharp ax. A bossled would be at the church door to take them to the timber and bring them back at noon, when they would be well fed and again returned to the timber lot. The trees were to be cut and trimmed into bob loads and hauled to the church lot by teams and sleds, where it would be sawed into stove-wood. If every church in the state did this, what a pile of coal we might save!" This is a new way to help win the war and keep on fighting the battle against sin at the same time. The plan deserves to find many imitators.

E. F. M., Troy, N. Y. The question you state carries its own obvious answer.

S. S., Kenyon, Minn. According to Hebrew tradition, Adam had a number of sons and daughters whose names do not appear in the Scripture record. Genesis, chapters 4 and 5, implies this, and it is held by some commentators that there may have been a considerable population within a comparatively small geographical radius. "Land of Nod" means
"land of exile."

A number of readers have answered our inquiry regarding Bunyan's "Holy War." It is evident, however, that while a fair proportion of our older friends know the book, and have felt its quaint charm and followed its story with real appreciation, very few of the younger generation ever saw a copy. Yet most of those who are familiar with it testify that it has helped to shape their religious life and their share in Christian work. We thank our friends for their letters on the subject.

J. T. H., Fremont, Ohio, writes: "I saw an article in the Christian Herald of January
2, with the heading 'Meatless and Wheatless Days.' We have a man in our neighborhood who has added 'eatless days.' He has not been moved from his bed for two years, yet he does clerical work and gets $2.25 per day, has a wife to support, pays house rent, bought two government war bonds, meets all his obligations promptly, and, besides all these, he has his 'eatless days.' He always greets his fellow men with a smile. His wife finds time from her other duties to knit sweaters for the soldiers. If any one can show greater patriotism under adverse circumstances, I would like to hear from them."

A friend sends us this little poem, which she has lovingly written and dedicated to the Christian Herald Family:

I seek in prayerful words, dear friends,
My heart's true wish to send you.
That you may know that far or near
My loving thoughts attend you.

I cannot find a truer word
Nor fonder to caress you,
No song, no poem I have heard
Is sweeter than "God bless you!"

God bless you! So I've wished you all
Of brightness life possesses;
For can there any prize at all
Be thine, unless God blesses?

God bless you! So I breathe a charm
Lest grief's dark night oppress you.
For ne'er can sorrow bring you harm
If 'tis God's way to bless you.

And so along "through all thy days
May shadows touch thee never—"
But this alone, God bless thee, friend,
Then art thou safe forever!
Martinsville, Va. Mrs. P. C. WRAY.

C. S., Otis, Colo., writes: "After reading
Mr. Carpenter's excellent article on 'Meat and Wheat to Feed the World,' the thought came to me that Mr. Carpenter had been slightly misinformed, and that rickets, stomach trouble and tuberculosis were caused by something besides the extra bran and whole wheat bread. I have never seen a better breakfast food than ground whole wheat, and have eaten lots of it, also plenty of bran bread and bread made partly of shorts, and never feel better than when I have plenty of it, and I have seen its good effects upon others. Also, in regard to the statement that 'The real food dictator of America is the farmer,' I have lived in this part of the country ever since wheat was raised here, and I know that, while there are a few large wheat-raisers, most of the wheat is raised by farmers who produce only a few hundred bushels each, and every one of them must take the price offered at the mills or elevators, or else take the risk of holding for an advance which does not always come. Most of the farmers have the greater part of their wheat on the market by New Year's, in order to pay their many expenses, and many have to go to the banks and renew their notes for another year.

Yet every year most of them are trying to produce more wheat, except when the price falls below sixty cents per bushel, and the only way the farmer can figure a profit in the fall is to not charge for his own work or time."

Lucy D., Parker, Arizona, writes: "When I finished reading the Christian Herald today, I felt a longing to reach out and give M. S. D., of Youngstown, Ohio, a heartily handclasp. It is the unselfish love that she bears for the babes God has committed to her care that makes her feel so keenly the needs of those other little ones. I have loved children all my life, and very recently some brown-skinned children have fallen to my care.
At first their skins seemed very brown;
but I soon forgot the color of their skin as I came to know better the real children. I am one of those employed by Uncle Sam to train his Indian youths for useful citizenship. I love my work and I find many interesting things here, enough to keep life from becoming at all monotonous, for you know

"The world is so full of a number of things,
I'm sure we should all be as happy
as kings."

Yet, as I cannot attend church, I do get hungry for just such cheering, strengthening messages as the Herald brings to us each week. But I want even more. I wish some of you would allow me to put your names upon my correspondence list. The letters in the Mail-Bag testify to the fact that some of you write letters quite as helpful as sermons."

There may be some of our readers who would like to send an occasional letter to this lonely teacher. We will gladly give her address to any who wish it.

J. K. H., Columbus, Ind. In the Lord's prayer we ask God to lead us not into temptation; in James we read that God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man, and Christ says that God is not willing that any should perish. The better rendering of that part of the Lord's Prayer, and one more fully in accordance with the spirit and meaning of the passage, is "suffer us not to be led into temptation." The petition as it stands is simply a humble expression of self-distrust and shrinking from danger—a prayer against yielding to temptation—and is equivalent to asking for support and deliverance when we are tempted. Our Lord himself taught his disciples to pray against this danger, when he said in the garden: "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation."

Mrs. H. S., Lathrop, Calif. Please explain the passage in John 13:8, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part in me."

The passage is not to be interpreted in the narrow, literal sense, as has often been done by popes and emperors. It means that we must be willing and glad to do the humblest service for each other and thus to become Christlike. We must note in this passage the words "with me." The Lord does not say "in me," but "with me," showing that he meant Peter and the believer to have, with him, a share in a work of self-sacrificing love, triumphant over the world and crowned with glory. This implied that unless Peter and the believer "enter into the spirit of that self-sacrificing love which Jesus performs; makes that spirit his own spirit; sees the beauty and owns the glory of his Master becoming the servant for his people's sake, and becomes in like manner ready to sacrifice himself—if he may thereby help the humblest member of the flock of Christ—then he is going his own way, not the way of Jesus."

People are asking why bread is cheaper in England than in America. The U. S. Food Administration furnishes the explanation:
"In England, a four-pound loaf of war-bread sells for 18 cents, a two-pound loaf for 9 cents and a pound loaf for 5 cents. These low prices are maintained in spite of the fact that the wheat must risk the submarine zone.
The explanation is that English bread is heavily subsidized. It is cheap to the people but costly to the government. In Great Britain, the government controls all the home-grown grain and imported wheat. This is sold to the mills at a price that, under rigid control, puts a cheap loaf on every man's table. England's cheap bread, however, costs the government $200,000,000 annually. Another reason why the Englishman pays less lies in the quality of the bread. In Great Britain a much higher per cent. of flour is extracted from the wheat than even the new regulations require in America. A substitution of 20 per cent. of other cereals or potatoes is compulsory in bread-making, and 50 per cent. is allowed. The high per cent. of substitution and government controlled prices explain cheap English bread. The yearly deficit of $200,000,000 on bread production is paid by the government, but comes out of the people's pockets eventually in general taxes."

Make Your Clothes Last Longer

YOUR clothes will last longer if you take out the spots and stains as soon as they appear. The Christian Herald will send you free an illustrated book that tells how.

Hot water takes out fruit stains, but if you use it on a milk stain or an egg stain it "drives it in" and makes it worse. Soap, on the other hand, takes out grease spots and makes fruit stains worse.

There is a remedy for every stain—even the scorched spots on cotton and linen.

The free book now being distributed by the Christian Herald lists 88 different kinds of stains and tells how to remove each of them. This book contains 35 pages and illustrations. To get your free copy, send your name and address to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C. Enclose a 2-cent stamp for return postage on the book.

Soon It Will Be Garden Time

YES, soon there will be a touch of Spring in the air. Soon the fields will show the brown of early March. On some of the slopes there is still a little snow but very quickly it will all be gone. And then the garden will call; the garden tools, the grape arbor and pruning shears, the raspberry canes at the end of the garden walk.

And this year it must be a real garden; must be planted so that there is no guesswork about it, because the boys "over there"—the Allies, need all the food that the big farms can supply. Yes, the home garden this year must be planted scientifically, effectively, economically.

"The Whole World Kin"

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE train was full of dusty, tired people—for it was evening time and the train was a through train that cut a great continent in half and joined two large cities. The folk who occupied the chair car had been traveling since early morning, and they were bored and inclined to be rather snappish. The porter, who brought glasses of water and cushions in answer to their fretful demands, was quite frankly nervous.

It was the conductor who caused a diversion. A fat bustling man he was, with gray hair and a pleasant smile. The smile was quite submerged as he stepped in at the doorway of the car.

"There's a woman in the day coach," he said, "with a sick baby. It's very crowded out there, and uncomfortable, and I couldn't help wondering whether one of you would be kind enough to give up your place to her. It's something that I wouldn't ask, ordinarily."

There was a traveling man in the car, and a college boy in ultra-fashionable clothing. There was an elderly couple, and a stately woman in a seal-skin coat. There was a girl with rouged cheeks and too elaborate jewels; and there was another girl whose simple frock spoke of Paris. There was a thin man who wrote busily with a huge fountain pen, and a stout man who had a professional-looking bag beside his chair. The stout man spoke.

"I'm a doctor," he said. "Tell the mother to come in here. She can have my place, and I'll take a look at the child."

THE bored people in the car straightened up in their places. They forgot, in a moment's time, that they were dusty and tired of traveling. They watched the door expectantly.

It wasn't long before the conductor came back with the mother. She was a thin, pale, little mother in a threadbare frock. And the tears stood, star-like, in her eyes.

"Oh," she said, pausing in the doorway, "you're-kind!" and she bent her head over the bundle in her arms—the shawl-wrapped bundle that was a baby.

A stir ran through the car—a friendly stir that was one-half interest and one-half sympathy. It was the traveling man who spoke first. He rose quite gallantly, and taking the little mother's arm guided her to the seat that the doctor had vacated.

"I hope," said the traveling man, "that the baby isn't very sick."

As if in answer to his question a whimper came from the depths of the shawl-wrapped bundle. The little mother sank wearily into the seat.

"Oh," she almost sobbed, "I'm afraid that he is!"

The doctor, with tender hands, was putting back the shawl. The baby face was a thin little face that was distorted with pain.

The woman in the sealskin coat leaned forward.

"Can I help?" she questioned. "I had a baby—once."

The doctor was gently touching the baby—touching its temple and wrist—with practiced fingers. Quite suddenly he opened its mouth, and then he spoke, for the first time.

"It's a tooth," said the doctor—"a very mean tooth."

THE elderly couple looked at each other knowingly. They half smiled. "John," said the wife, with a shake of her silver head, "had a terrible time getting teeth. Do you remember?"

The husband reached for her hand across the space between their chairs. It was more than a car aisle that he reached across—it was a chasm of years.

"Yes," he answered, "I remember."

"Hey, porter!" It was the doctor calling. "Bring a glass of water!"

"Yessir," answered the porter. The sullen nervousness had been swept magically from his face.

The college boy was interested, but somehow, boylike, he was a bit ashamed of his interest.

"Is the little fellow very sick?" he questioned. "Is it very dangerous to get a tooth, I wonder?"

The baby's whimper was softer now, and the doctor nodded reassuringly to the mother as he began to drop medicine from a small vial into the glass of water that the eager porter handed him.

Quite unconsciously the girl in the simple frock answered the college boy's question.

"Sometimes," she said, "it's very dangerous when teeth are coming. I have two little sisters—twins—and though we've always had a trained nurse to care for them, every new tooth is a problem and a worry! One of the babies hasn't suffered at all, but the other—"

THE doctor was feeding the medicine to the baby.

"This," he said, "will ease the pain. Poor little fellow! And by morning, maybe, the tooth will have come through. Anyway he'll not suffer so, again, for the worst is over!"

The little mother's shoulder shook. The tears that had been trembling on her lashes rolled down her cheeks. Helplessly she looked around the car.

"You've been like angels to me," she choked. "We're going on, you see, to meet baby's father. He's got a new job in Chicago and it was only yesterday that the money for our fare came. It was hard for him, saving the money and getting a little flat ready for us. We haven't seen him for a month, baby and I. And I was afraid"—she paused, a scrap of a handkerchief at her eyes, "that baby'd never get there—alive."

The man with the huge fountain pen had stopped writing long before. For the first time he spoke.

"That little woman's going all to pieces," he said briskly, but his brisk voice covered a certain understanding. "Can't some of you ladies—" he glanced impartially around the car—"take care of the little kiddy while she gets some rest?"

The girl in the Paris frock started forward—so did the elderly lady. The stately woman in sealskin held out appealing arms. But it was the girl with the many jewels that first reached the mother.

"Let me hold him," she said quite fiercely. "Blessed little thing! Let me hold him!" And the over-manicured hands that touched the shabby shawl were very gentle hands.

"ONE touch of nature," they say, "makes the whole world kin." And it's the truest thing that ever has been said. For that little suffering baby brought a earload of selfish, bored people very close together under a common band of sympathy and a common desire to help.

We were reading a story together, a writer-man and I, the other day. It wasn't a great story, but it left us with misty eyes and a certain catch in our throats.

"Oh," said the writer-man to me, "don't I wish that I'd written that story!"

"Why do you wish that?" I questioned. (For I, too, wished that I could have been the author of it.)

"Because," answered the writer-man, "it's so very human. I'd rather write something human than something subtle and unspeakably clever and great."

The human touch is the touch that seems, somehow, to make our lives worth while. If we lack that touch—and are not able to feel the spirit of fellowship that such a touch imparts—we are very likely to live our lives in a rather unpleasantly solitary manner.

It is the human touch—the one touch of nature—that makes some speakers successful orators who can play responsive chords on the heartstrings of a crowd while other speakers are never more than elocutionists. It is the human touch that has made many a motion picture star famous. More than one writer has become popular because folk, reading his stories, are impelled to say, "I've felt just that way myself." And there are even ministers of the Gospel who have been more successful at saving souls because they have been able to talk, not down from a pulpit to a congregation, but as man to man and brother to brother.

AND now, in this time of war and tumult, it is the human touch that keeps each day from being an utterly dark day. The mother with her only son (who graduated from Plattsburg) over in France can feel a certain relationship with the little Irish woman whose boy is a private in the "Fighting Sixty-ninth." And the shopgirl who is skilfully knitting gray wool into a warm sock can smile at the fashionable debutante who is struggling with her knitting—can smile and offer friendly advice. The silk service-flag in the limousine window tells the same story that is told by the cotton flag on the tenement house door.

Oh, friends of mine, when you begin to think that the world is full of sorrow and discontent and snobbishness—when you begin to think that gold counts for more than human kindness—look for that touch of nature, that "one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin." And you'll be sure to find it—be you in shop or slum, in mansion or cottage, in a Pullman or a subway car—for it is a blessed touch that lives—and will live—wherever there are people who have minds and souls and hearts.

SOMETIMES By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SOMETIMES, when th' way seems weary,
Sometimes when th' world seems blue;
Sometimes when yer outlook's dreary,
And there don't seem nothin' new—

Sometimes when yer pleasures bore you,
And there ain't no one that cares;
When yer life lies all before you
Like a narrer flight o' stairs—

Sometimes, when th' sun a-shinin'
Seems ter have a brassy gleam,
An' 'cause there ain't no linin'
Storm clouds are just what they seem—

Sometimes then yer hate just livin',
Hate to smile an' do yer part;
Sometimes then life seems just givin',
Givin' from an empty heart—

Then's the time ter look for laughter
In a stranger's vivid eyes;
Then's the time ter follow after Fairy gold that always lies

Where th' rainbow seeks the hollow
Off behind th' purple hill;
Where th' winds cry "Follow, follow!"
An' th' day is calm and still.

Then's th' time to watch th' gleamin',
Of th' tender stars at night—
Stars that laugh together, seemin',
Just ter show th' world is right!

Then's th' time ter sing, and, singin',
Let some other join yer song;
Then's th' time you should be, bringin'
Smiles where only smiles belong.

Sometimes when th' way seems dreary,
Sometimes when th' world seems sad,
Help somebody worn an' weary,
An' your life will soon be glad!

Fire Values.

-and how to judge them-

THESE are days of conservation, a time to make every dollar do its utmost. Some basic information about tire values is opportune.

Many different makes of tires are advertised here, and elsewhere, but in a way that must make tire advertising as a whole rather confusing to car owners, particularly those with their first car.

Claims conflict, glittering generalities are the rule, the natural partiality of each manufacturer for his own product gives a sameness to the argument, all of which leaves the tire buyer who really wants to buy with discrimination quite at sea.

That is why Firestone advertising presents to the public the fundamental principles of good tires, tires as they ought to be, Most Miles per Dollar tires.

Below is shown a cross section of a Firestone Cord Tire. This is the tire that is giving car owners the greatest possible efficiency in wear and fuel economy. Each part is designated and briefly described.

Inspect, for a few moments, the vital units of this construction, and their significance in tire service and economy will be made clear. Then ask your dealer to show you cross sections of tires. You will soon be buying more intelligently, making every dollar do its utmost.

FIRESTONE TIRE & RUBBER CO., AKRON, OHIO, BRANCHES AND DEALERS EVERYWHERE

Tread It is no simple matter to make a tread that absorbs every small road shock and at the same time successfully repels the abrasive wear of the sharpest surfaces of pavement or highway. Yet this thing has been done. The remarkable mileage of this enduring tread is a matter of record in every section of the country.

Cord and Rubber Body Each wall of stout cord in the Firestone Cord Tire is free to act untrammelled by friction with the adjoining cord walls. Firestone construction assures a flexible unity that is astonishingly strong and enduring.

Reinforcement for Sidewall and Bead One of the greatest sources of tire trouble is the "bending point." Firestone engineers have devised a special reinforcement that carries this "hinge" to the widest portion of the tire where this action has least effect.

Cushion Stock This section of fine rubber is a shield to the body or "carcass" of the tire. It absorbs road blows. The Firestone method of making it from the purest rubber and of unusual thickness has added materially to its effective performance.

Most Miles per Dollar

Breaker Strip The breaker strip in form is a combination of a special open fabric and a rubber formula different from all other parts of the tire. Every road blow is spread by the breaker strip over such a large area of the cushion and the body of the tire that its damaging quality is lost.

Side Wall Here is the protecting element for the body on each side between tread and bead. A combination of great resilience and resisting power is necessary. The special Firestone side wall rubber has proved more than a match for the wear it must withstand.

Piano Wire The fine piano wires of the bead form one of the most interesting elements of the Firestone Cord Tires. The bead is the anchorage for the entire structure and must cling firmly to the rim no matter what the stress. It is a fact worthy of note that each Firestone Cord Tire contains enough piano wire to equip four pianos.

BOSS Glass Door OVEN

Put Your Kitchen on a War Basis

The government asks for economy—economy of food, economy of fuel. The Boss Glass Door Oven is helping to bring both to over a million American homes.

Every housewife knows how food can easily be spoiled in old-fashioned, solid-door ovens. There are only two ways to bake in such an oven. You either guess that things are doing all right and hope for the best or you open the door to look. And right there lies the greatest danger to successful baking. The slightest draught of cool air can do a lot of damage. It results in your bread being doughy, your cake falling flat or the pies coming out soggy—or otherwise your bakings burn or char. There is always that element of uncertainty with an old-style oven. You are never sure of results.

But with a Boss Oven you know, all the time, just how to regulate the heat, exactly how fast things are baking, the right time to take them out. You see, you see through the glass door. No uncertainty about that! You keep right on with your other work. A glance now and then assures you that all is well and the result is that you always have perfectly baked, delicious foods, no disappointments, no waste.

The Boss helps to save the nation's coal supply too. It is used on oil, gas or gasoline stoves only. Don't use your coal range now. Our industries, which are so important in winning this war, need the coal.

The Boss Glass Door Oven is the modern oven. It is easy to regulate. Its patent deflector distributes the heat evenly. It is economical to operate, handsome in appearance and will last a lifetime. The Glass Door does not steam up. We guarantee that. It is as easy to look in your Boss Oven as it is to look out your kitchen window. Buy a Boss and watch it bake, and have crisp, brown, tempting dishes, always.

Remember, all glass door ovens are not Boss Ovens. The glass of the Boss Oven is guaranteed to remain unaffected by the heat. Buy it by name and then, and then only are you certain of getting the genuine "Boss."

We shall be glad to send you our interesting booklet and the name of the Boss Dealer nearest you.

Young People's Topics for March 3

He Died in My Stead

Epworth League Topic. John 15:31;
1 Peter 2:21; Heb. 12:2

THIS topic can be better understood today by most of us than it would have been a year or two ago. Now vacant chairs in every chapter room, filled on rare furloughs by young men in olive drab, stand as living, present illustrations of vicarious sacrifice. Their lives are offered for ours. There is no inherent reason in us why our lives should be left to round out their normal days while they should face the enemy; but they go and we stay and they, if they die, die for us. Shall we say the innocent for the guilty? It might be. But Christ died for us. Innocent of all sin, he died that miserable sinners, such as you and I, might, through his sacrifice, approach the throne of God and call Jehovah "Our Father." The life of Christ revealed the Father; his death removed the barriers of sin for all of us, opened the gates of blessedness and prepared for us an abundant entrance into the holy place of the Father's love. There are some who refuse to accept the atonement of Christ because they can't understand it or fathom the reasons for its necessity. There are some things that can be experienced better than they can be explained. Christian faith proves itself. Every one who accepts the sacrifice of Christ receives in his heart, along with release from his burden of sin, the living proof of the truth. We cannot explain it. We can only thank God that he so loved us that he was willing to send his Son to die for us. Then, throwing open our hearts to be filled with his Spirit, we should seek to show forth his love that those other thousands for whom, too, he died may learn of him through us.

Christian Duty and Privilege. III. Prayer
Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics. John 14:12-17
(Consecration Meeting.)

"I WILL pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever." Jesus, himself, set us the example of prayer. At every critical point in his three years' ministry we see him at prayer. We are shown Jesus returning from the hills or the desert after a night of prayer to triumph once more over every enemy and adverse circumstance. Then, in the Garden and on the Cross, he finds in prayer the strength to keep his human will equal to his divine commission. Christ was our example in prayer. If the Son of God needed to commune with the Father in prayer, how much more do we need to come into his presence on our knees! The place of prayer is still the fountain of power. To this fountain it is our privilege to go. The Saviour's sacrifice, which cleansed from us the stain of inborn and of committed sin, bought us this privilege. Like our salvation, it was bought with a price, yet to us it is a free gift of divine love. The Father waits to hear the petitions of his children. Thus it is our privilege. But it is also our duty to make full use of this privilege. Our own salvation is only an incident in the saving of the world. The thread of saving grace runs from someone else to us and on from us again to another. Someone told us of Christ, someone whose life showed enough of the divine to make us believe in the message told us. We cannot pass the message on unless our own lives radiate the sincere love of Christ and meet the world's measure of what a Christian's life should be. No matter how we try, any life we live in our own strength will be futile and weak and unconvincing. Only by frequent seasons of refreshment at this prayer fountain of spiritual power can we gain strength enough to live in this worldly world as sons of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ in the Kingdom. Therefore prayer is also our duty. It is a happy duty, a duty that brings in its performance the deepest blessing our hearts can know. Thus it can never remain merely a duty; it must always appear a blessed privilege. The privilege and the duty both are ours; the blessing that waits on prayer is ours to claim.

The Muzzled Oxen—Our Cover Picture

THE threshing-floors are usually located near the village on a hard piece of ground, or preferably on a large flat rock. Here the sheaves are gathered together and first piled up in an even number of heaps. The Israelites were commanded to give a tenth of their produce to the priests as tithes. It was in this connection that Christ said of the Pharisees, who strained only in the letter to obey the law, "Ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law" (Matt. 23:23).

Today these tithes are still paid in kind. A few years ago they were a tenth, but now an eighth is exacted as a government tax. So all the sheaves must be gathered into the threshing-floor, and after one of the eight piles has been selected by the tax collector, the fellah begins the laborious task of threshing the grain, which often requires months to complete.

The cattle are tied together abreast and driven round and round over the outspread grain. To protect their feet two small iron shoes are nailed to each hoof, as we infer must have been the custom in Bible days from the passage in Micah which reads thus: "Arise and thresh—for I will make thine horn iron and thy hoofs brass" (Micah 4:13).

As the straw is gradually reduced by this simple process to little bits, and the grain is knocked out of the ears, the farmer keeps stirring the pile and adding more to it, and when completely done he piles it up and awaits the evening breezes for the winnowing.

How is it that we see the cattle muzzled while treading out the grain (which the Israelites were forbidden to do), by a people who live up to, as we have been seeing, although unknown to them, so many of the laws given to the Hebrews? Ordinarily when treading out barley or other grain they allow the animals to eat all they want, the fellah saying that it is "haram" (a sin) to muzzle them. But the case of a young animal that will overeat and thereby injure itself is an exception, as is also the threshing of the wheat. Wheat and bread, as we have before seen, are called "aish" (life), and are held to be almost sacred, so that any one wasting or profaning them is deemed to merit the punishment of Allah. So strict are they that if a crumb of bread is dropped by a child it is picked up by the elder ones, kissed and laid on a wall or in a crack where birds can get it, rather than have it trodden under foot. Therefore it is that when wheat is being threshed the cattle are muzzled.

Our picture was taken at the large threshing-floor at Bireh, about seven miles north of Jerusalem. Bireh means cistern or well, so named possibly on account of its possessing a good spring of water. Undoubtedly it is the ancient Beeroth, which in Hebrew has the same meaning as the modern Arabic name. It was a town of Benjamin, but before the Israelite invasion Beeroth belonged to the Hivites, and from here and the neighboring Gibeon and other towns came the men who through guile made a covenant with Joshua as soon as he entered the Promised Land (Joshua 9).

A tradition from the fourteenth century locates Bireh as the site where Mary and Joseph first missed the child Jesus when they were returning from the feast at Jerusalem. It is today the first stopping-place for the people who have been to Jerusalem to the yearly feasts, as they go back on foot or riding asses and other beasts, a fact that helps us to feel that this medieval tradition is correct. JOHN D. WHITING.

THE Rev. Franklin Babbitt, the aged and venerable pastor of Grace Episcopal Church, Nyack, N. Y., passed away on January 24, at the ripe old age of 87 years. He was a man of singular activity. In a feeble frame there was lodged an indomitable spirit. For fifty-six consecutive years he had been the active rector of Grace Church, which had practically grown up under his hands.

When the Christian Herald Children's Home was founded in 1894, Dr. Babbitt was one of the first friends of the work. He was a frequent and always welcome visitor to the Home, and every summer the little guests grew more and more to love him. His fine Christian spirit and his helpful and inspiring talks made him a host of friends among the little folk, and the management of the Home was indebted to him for these kindly ministrations through all the years. There are many thousands of the Mont-Lawn children who have now reached manhood and womanhood, who will recall the pleasure which the visits of the kindly old rector always brought to the Home. His influence over these cannot be measured in words.

Dr. Babbitt was born in Saco, Maine, in 1825. His first charge as an Episcopal pastor was in a little church in Middle Patent, near New Bedford, and later he became curate of the Episcopal church at North Tarrytown, N. Y. There was at that time no Episcopal church at Nyack, and he came over the river and undertook the work of gathering a congregation and founding a church. His first meetings were held in the homes of his parishioners, and later in a schoolhouse while the chapel was being made ready for occupancy. The cornerstone of the present Episcopal church was laid in 1869.

He was an active soul-winner, and took care both of the Lord's House and the little flock that gathered in it. Those fifty-six years were years of steady spiritual and material growth. In 1911 his church gave him a golden jubilee reception and a purse of $2,000, which he turned back into the church property. He built up a large Sunday-school in connection with his church.

1,006, which is 532 more than in 1916. The Roman Catholic Church contributes 150 of this increase.

Changes of the Year

SOME changes are quite evident on the face of the returns. The Roman Catholic Church added to its numbers in 1916 nearly 390,000 estimated communicants; the editor of the "Official Catholic Directory" estimates the net increase for 1917 at 175,000 "population," which represents 148,750 communicants, a falling off in net gains of 241,250. The reason which promptly suggests itself is failure of immigration, which has long been a source of increase to that polyglot Church. But the slump in immigration began with the outbreak of the European War in August, 1914, and was in full force in 1915 and 1916. Moreover, the return of European aliens to their own lands was large in the first years of the War. Churches embracing foreign-speaking elements in their membership, as the Roman Catholic, the Serbian, the Russian Orthodox, the German Evangelical Synod and some Lutheran bodies, have been affected by the War, and yet have held their own and a little more. The Hungarian Reformed Church reports a net loss in membership of 4,500 in 1917, about a fourth of its entire strength in the United States.

The Baptists, Northern, Southern and Colored, have had, taken together, an aggregate net increase of 77,667, on the basis of a total numerical strength of 6,160,602, a larger increase than in 1916, but not so large as that of 1915. The Methodist Episcopal, Southern and Colored Methodist Episcopal Churches report an aggregate net gain of nearly 174,000; the Presbyterian bodies, of 54,278, to which the Northern branch contributed 38,416; the Disciples of Christ had a net increase of over 59,000; the Roman Catholic Church of 148,750; the American Old Catholic Church, of 10,000; the Syrian Orthodox Church of 5,000; the German Evangelical Church of 5,177; the Congregational denomination, of 12,200; the Lutheran bodies, of 6,603; the Protestant Episcopal Church, of 4,931; the United Brethren of 1,082, and the Reformed Churches Dutch, German and Christian, of 3,998, which was more than equalled by the loss of 4,500 by the fourth member of the group, the Hungarian branch. With a few notable exceptions, the gains of each of the denominations are less than usual.

A Talk With Participants in the Second Bible Picture Study

HERE we are—at last!—with our announcement of the winners of the Second Bible Picture Study. We fully expected that this important piece of news, awaited so patiently by our readers, would have been given you long before this; but our explanations have informed all of you of the reasons for the delay. In the Third Bible Picture Study we will do much, much better. For one thing, the Third Study comprises only 30 pictures, instead of the 60 that made up the series in the Second Study.

A glance at the two pages of names in this number will tell you who have carried off the cash rewards in the Second Study, but a flood of letters from members of the Christian Herald Family Circle lets us know that these thousand names here are few indeed compared to those who have received mental and spiritual rewards in the Study exceeding in value the cash prizes. After reading over these letters we feel sure that no participant considers that he or she has lost; where so much must needs be gained there can be no "losers."

Some of the Scores

FIRST prize winner submitted a total of 222 verses, of which 84 were "correct" or "best," and therefore 138 were incorrect.

Second prize winner submitted a total of 220, with 82 of them "correct," and 138 incorrect.

Third prize winner submitted 228, of which 82 were "correct" and 146 incorrect.

The winner of the one thousandth prize submitted 210, of which 70 were "correct."

Those were the scores of some of the cash prize winners. By the time this announcement meets your eye they will all, very probably, have received their checks. We hope to publish the photographs of the chief winners, with something about each, in an early issue.

Thanks for Your Checking Aid!

NOW as to the "self checking" system, in which our participants helped so well in determining the winners. We thank all who participated in it, and assure all that every set of verses received a careful check. In cases where no checking was received from participants we went straight to their sets and checked them ourselves. In some cases checking sheets, owing to the congested condition of the mails, and the slowness of delivery to us from all parts of the country, were late, and by the time they arrived we ourselves had checked up the sets they represented, and so could compare our result by the result on the checking sheet. We extended the time limit for receiving checking sheets, and every set received attention.

Of course our first task was to compare the highest scores shown on the checking sheets sent in with the actual sets of verses sent in, and in some cases we found that many, very probably, had lost their duplicate sets of verses, and done their checking from memory. Some of the checking sheets received showed much higher scores than the sets of verses here showed, and without doubt the participant in these cases recalled the best verse designated for a picture, and concluded that he or she actually had submitted it. Of course the sets of verses here proved in each case just what verses had been submitted. Naturally the participant would have become very familiar with all the verses in "Pearls from the Bible," and probably would have considered many of them as possible answers for the pictures, though not submitting them. So memory would play false, and the participant would credit his or her checking sheet with the verse.

Other participants, who submitted two or three sets of verses, lumped them together and turned in only one checking sheet, on which all the best verses given in all the sets were credited. Of course each set of verses stands by itself, and a checking sheet should have been submitted for each individual set of verses.

Every Set Accounted For

OUR January 2 issue, in which the best verses were published, was in many cases late in reaching subscribers—in these war times the mails are so congested that even first-class mail is frequently late. This caused concern on the part of those who feared that their checking sheets would arrive too late, but there was no such thing as arriving too late, and we saw that each set of verses here was accounted for.

You will notice that in announcing the winners this time we are only giving the name of the state in which each resides. This is done at the suggestion of the winners of the First Bible Picture Study, who stated that the publication of their home or city address resulted in a large number of letters and personal callers, well nigh overwhelming them with a flood of solicitation, advice as to how to spend their rewards, and commercial correspondence. In retrospect it had its humorous side, but was quite trying while it lasted.

Jesus Bringing Peace

International Sunday School Lesson for March 3. Mark 4:35 to 5:20

Troubled Waters and Troubled Minds

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

OUR lesson section covers Mark's brief account of the stilling of the storm of the Sea of Galilee and his longer story of the calming of the Gadarene demoniac. The common factor gives us the topic—Jesus bringing peace, peace without and peace within. How fundamentally needful is this ministry of the Master, for individual life still has all its storm and stress, and the whole world is tempestuous and blatant with war-cries. We need, oh, so much, to find his secret and to learn how to receive the peace he only can impart. "My peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

What a mingling of the common and the sublime we see here—the weary Man fast asleep after his day's work, unheeding the noise of the rising storm, and the calm unshaken Son of God apostrophizing the wind and the sea with quiet confidence. No storm at sea intimidates him, no mad rush of enemies makes his heart quail, no awful catastrophe renders him impotent to help and to save. He is equal to all life's emergencies. So his disciples learned then, and so his disciples feel or should feel today. Can we say with Paul, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him"? Have we truly committed all, unto him?

Our hearts sink within us at the sound of the uproar in France, where our sons are entering the fray, and we are tempted to fear the outcome. But Christ stands sure above the battle, his face marred with sorrow that such things should still be, but his soul undaunted, sure, competent, never failing any man or nation that truly looks unto him. And he is not yet defeated; his Kingdom still hastens on.

The Pilot of the Church and the Soul

Ancient commentators were fond of making that little ship a type of the Church, and such it may well be, for Christ and the Twelve were there. When the sudden tempest swept down and the waves began to beat into the boat, it was the whole future of Christianity that was at stake. And the disciples lost faith. That is why he reproached them, because they could not realize that his cause could not possibly fail. The Almighty God had an interest in the outcome, and Jesus never doubted.

So it was when Jesus was crucified and for a time the apostles believed his whole enterprise was wrecked. Remember the walk to Emmaus and the doleful tones, "We hoped that it was he who should redeem Israel." They had lost hope because they did not realize that it was impossible for even death to thwart him.

So it was with some when Nero and Domitian set out to exterminate the Church of Christ, and the storm was frightful indeed, but Jesus piloted his Kingdom through. So also it was when the Holy Roman Empire rose up against the new freedom of the Protestant Reformation, and some great Christians doubted. So it is today when many are exclaiming, as they see the atrocities of the war, "Where is now their God?" Let us not be faithless but believing. Christianity will ride out this storm also, and behold, all things shall become new.

Now, what is true of the Church is true of every believer whose frail bark sets out for the haven with Christ on board. Contrary winds? Of course. Black days when no rays of the sun pierce through earth's cloud? Yes, for every one without exception has experienced such. Storms when we are at our wit's end? Most saints have had them. "Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses; he maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still." (Psalm 107: 23-31. Be sure to read it in Sunday-school.)

If thou but suffer God to guide thee,
And hope in him through all thy ways,
He'll give thee strength whate'er betide thee,
And bear thee through the evil days.
God never yet forsook at need
The soul that trusted him indeed.

Our trouble is that, like the disciples of old, we forget that we have Christ with us in the ship. When we cry out in fear to him, he often seems to say, "Why, I was here all the while; wherefore didst thou doubt?" Then, as he stands before us, our hearts resume their normal throb and a great calm comes, a calm that worldly men marvel at. Haven't you seen it when the bereaved mother suddenly finds that the Comforter has come? Haven't you read of young George Matheson, stricken with blindness, but never faltering in faith, so that he became a wonderful preacher and soul-winner? Is there really anything that can befall us that can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord? The peace of God which passeth understanding should so keep our hearts and minds that it should be manifest to all who meet us day by day.

Christianity and Insanity

What a pitiful story we have here of this poor demoniac, ill-treated, misjudged, driven into outrageous madness by the ignorance and superstition of the time! Even in the seventeenth century, the belief in witchcraft blackened the pages of Christian history with a record of 200,000 persons put to death! Learned judges, devout priests and ministers of the Gospel condemned poor, demented old women to a horrible fate. Yet despite such mistakes of Christians, the influence of Jesus has ameliorated the lot of countless sufferers from mental diseases and resulted in the healing of many. When Jesus came there were tomb-like cells, chains and blows for such as this man of Gadara. Now there are well-equipped refuges, beautiful grounds and skilled treatments. Why, perhaps Jesus' words were the first kind, sympathetic tones the Gadarene had heard in years! With what utter compassion any one would now speak to a soul thus afflicted! People are more Christ-like in this. Because of Jesus' teaching they are less afraid.

This poor fellow was not too far gone in mind to be restored. How tactful Jesus was! What a beautiful touch Mark gives, as he pictures the restored man, no longer naked and filthy, but sitting beside Jesus Christ, clothed and in his right mind. It is emblematic of the whole mission of the Master. He came to bring men to themselves that they might arise and go to their Father. He came to cast out the frightful hates and lusts and greeds of body and mind, that curse the earth with madness and misery. He sent forth his disciples as apostles of sanity. Paul is an example, as he seeks to calm the possessed girl at Philippi, restrains the impulsive jailor from suicide, reasons with the hostile mob of maddened persecutors. He himself had once thought himself "religious," as he went about "breathing threatening and slaughter"; but had learned the secret of poise and peace. A modern example of the sanity that Jesus brings is found in the familiar story of Africaner, the fierce and brutal savage who became such a loyal supporter of Robert Moffat in his missionary labors. Yet more typical is the story of Thakombau, the wonderful chief of the Fijians, and the transformation of wild cannibals into earnest Christians within a generation.

How strange it is that the gigantic insanity of international war should so long have resisted the influence of Christianity! Think of it! The combined brains and hearts of millions of Christians have not evolved a superior method of settling international disputes to that of wholesale slaughter! War is the last and greatest of all insanities. May there be such a unity of Christian sentiment and such a realization of the awful sufferings of men, that the first mighty resolution of the Federation of the World shall be, "This thing must never happen again."

"Fear not," was the first Gospel message. Sanity is based on an absence of fear. Our lesson shows us men afraid in a storm, afraid of demons, afraid of the insane, afraid even of Jesus himself. Back of all this present famine and battle is fear of other races, of other nations, of other classes of society. But "God gave us not a spirit of fear but of power and love and of a sound mind." This is a Pauline definition of the essence of Christianity—a sense of power that emancipates us from weakness and dread, a perfect love that casteth out fear, a sound mind that discerns real values and seeks first the Kingdom of God.

Apostles at Home

The reclaimed man wanted to follow Jesus as a companion of his missionary work. But Jesus suffered him not, but sent him as a witness among his own friends. Not every one marvelously saved is appointed a foreign missionary or a pastor. Many, like this man, are not qualified, but in their zeal seek the ordination of the Church. But, on the other hand, every loyal believer in Christ receives the commission of an apostolate at home. "Go, tell thy friends how great things the Lord hath done for thee." Mark tells us that a profound impression was made by the testimony that in Jesus is the secret of sanity of mind, and confidence in God's providence, and peace and good will among men. Let us evidence by our words and deeds that Christ brings peace even in the storm, a peace that this world cannot take away.

Dear Lord and Father of mankind,
Forgive our feverish ways!
Reclothe us in our rightful mind;
In purer lives thy service find;
In deeper reverence praise.

Drop thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of thy peace.

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association.

Parents Who Fail

SEVEN little Brownies came to father and mother in the old home. And with each new-comer father worked harder, and mother managed even more shrewdly to make ends meet. Once in hard times it came down to butterless bread. Patches then were on my suits, but always neatly sewed. I was the last of four boys and the legitimate heir, therefore, to all that my brothers could no longer wear. And I can recall the pride when, as a boy of fourteen, I handed mother my first week's earnings as a New York errand boy. But one thing our home never lacked. We never went short on prayer, praise and feeding on the old Book. Father was of Welsh stock, was converted early in life, taught school, loved poetry, and would walk miles to a good prayer meeting. I can see him now, his chin tilted up a bit, his face shining, as he sang with the congregation "Majestic Sweetness Sits Enthroned" or "Oh, for a Thousand Tongues to Sing." My mother was born in Gloucester, England, coming to America after her marriage, with her first baby. She had backbone, sweetness, patience. I thought her beautiful, and she was. Neither father nor mother had any modern methods in bringing us up. Mother would never go in debt, and he first story I told was washed out with soap. When I came home from the church meeting at eleven years of age and told her I had made my decision for Christ, there were two silent, happy souls. And when we boys started a little praying band in the neighborhood that met in cellars as well as parlors, it was mother encouraged me on.

It was, after all, the atmosphere of that home, rather than particular methods that gripped and fashioned us, and the encouragement we received in our efforts to push up and on. I recall that my weekly job was to write a new Scripture text in chalk on the long face of the stone mantelpiece. I would hunt for the choicest passages I could find of the right length to be contained on that facing. Thus "upon the posts of thy house and thy gates" the divine words were inscribed, as commanded, for the family to read.

Then I remember father offering me a reward if I recited from memory the fifty-third of Isaiah. And today that great prophecy clings to my memory. And I was to have a fine Bible of my own as soon as I read through the whole Bible. So one year for a whole summer and winter I found my way each morning to the parlor, unlocked the hasp of the big family Bible, and faithfully read my two chapters. And I have today the Bible I won—a brown leather-covered book, inscribed to me by father.

Father and mother went home nearly together sixteen years ago. Seven years before their going, forty-five children and grandchildren came together at their golden wedding to celebrate the event and every one of these was a member of the church. Truly a great testimony to the influence of a Bible-loving home environment.

And the parents who fail at this point fail completely. Children have the right to such an inheritance, and bank accounts and property are no substitute. They are trash in comparison.

To those parents who do not want to fail, it is just here that a real help comes in the Christian Herald National Bible Picture Contest Plan. This plan makes it possible for parents and children to unite in the searching of the Book, in memorizing outstanding passages, in fitting pictures to texts in a fascinating way. If I had had some such plan as a boy I would have thought it a great thing.

Leaving out the question of the rewards offered, the enrichment of memory from this plan, the joy in finding a fitting verse for the picture, the good-natured family competition as notes are compared, make this a really worth-while effort. Parents would do well to try it out as a help in creating home atmosphere. Then, having proved it, tell other parents about it.

To Sunday-school teachers this plan of using the Sunday School Lessons and Home Readings and Golden Texts for the five months ending in April may offer a good way to encourage the beginning of daily family worship in thousands of homes now strangers to this blessing.

Sugar and Meat

MANY people who like home made candy are forced, because of the shortness of the sugar market, to give it up. The Food Administration suggests the following recipes that, though sugarless, will appeal to the lover of sweets.

Pop-corn Candy. For making pop-corn candy either honey, maple syrup, molasses, white cane syrup or corn syrup may be used instead of sugar. To one cup of syrup allow one tablespoon of vinegar. Boil together until syrup hardens when dropped in cold water. Pour over freshly popped corn and mold into balls or fancy shapes for the Christmas tree. Little pop-corn men will please the children. Mark in the features and outlines with melted chocolate.

Chocolate Dainties. Put through the meat-chopper one-half cup each of dates, figs, and nut meats. Add one tablespoon orange juice, a little grated orange peel, and one square of melted unsweetened chocolate. Mold into balls and roll in chopped nuts or granulated sugar. This mixture may be packed in an oiled tin, put under a weight until firm.

Maple Creams. Boil one cup maple sugar with one cup water until it forms a soft ball when dropped in cold water. Remove from the fire and stir rapidly until it becomes creamy. Form into balls the size of marbles, put nut meats on either side. Cool on wax paper.

It is possible, also, to make a little meat go a long way. In combination with other food products a small piece of meat can be stretched to flavor a whole dish.

Fish Chowder. Rabbit, fowl, or any meat may be used instead of the fish, or tomatoes instead of milk. Carrots may be omitted.

One and one-half pound fish (fresh, salt, or canned), 9 potatoes peeled and cut in small pieces, 1 onion, 2 cups carrots cut in pieces, 3 cups milk, pepper, 3 tablespoons flour, 1 tablespoon fat.

Fry chopped onion in fat for five minutes. Put fat, onions, carrots and potatoes in kettle and cover with boiling water. Cook until vegetables are tender. Mix flour with one-half cup cold milk and stir in liquid in pot to thicken. Add the rest of the milk and the fish which has been removed from the bone and cut in small pieces. Cook until the fish is tender, about ten minutes. Serve hot.

Potted Hominy and Beef. Five cups cooked hominy, 4 potatoes, 2 cups carrots, 1 teaspoon salt, $\frac{1}{4}$ pound dried beef, 2 cups milk, 2 tablespoons fat, 2 tablespoons flour.

Melt the fat, stir in the flour, add the cold milk, and mix well. Cook until it thickens. Cut the potatoes and carrots in dice, mix all the materials in a baking-dish, and bake for one hour.

The English Manifesto on the Second Advent

educational circles, especially in the Sunday-school world, and has escaped thus far the charge of being a crank, or a fanatic, or an obscurantist, or any other thing commonly associated with a literal interpretation of the Bible. He is writing on "Evangelism, Education and Democracy," and he says:

Sixty millions of our one hundred million citizens have no connection with any church. There are fifteen million children in this country who receive no religious guidance whatever. There are thirty-five million over ten years of age outside the membership of any church. There are ten thousand small towns west of the Missouri River in which Christian preaching is rarely, or never, heard.

New sciences, new psychology, new wealth, new forms of amusement, are all factors in the decreasing interest in religious training. We are fast drifting into a cultured paganism. Unless the Church takes immediate steps to stem the present tide of indifference, luxury, and commercial greed, this country will soon cease to be a Christian nation—if, indeed, a country in which three out of four of its citizens are without active church relations can be said to be a Christian nation now.

If the professor is stating facts as they are in the United States, it will scarcely be disputed that conditions are not radically different among our Allies. And if so, how can such a world and such a paganism church pass intelligent and sober judgment upon a "Manifesto" like that under consideration? "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and he will show them his covenant." (Ps. 25 : 14.)

Is it possible, therefore, that the world and the Church needed a spiritual shock at this time, and were these English divines, after all, led of the Holy Spirit in this Manifesto?

Alas! that it should so soon have been forgotten!

What the good tractor is to the farm—

The Detroit Vapor Stove is to the kitchen

A Detroit Vapor Stove means quick, thorough cooking and baking. These stoves, although burning oil, are comparable only to gas ranges in their powerful instantaneously efficient burners, their ease of control, and their substantial construction.

They have no wicks and nothing like a wick—no asbestos rings or other substitutes for wicks. They vaporize the oil, so that they really burn a gas rather than a liquid fuel.

The burners are big and heavy and almost everlasting. They give an intensely hot blue flame that can be graduated down to any desired degree. The kettle goes on as soon as the match is struck.

Detroit Vapor Stoves cost less for fuel than other oil stoves, less than coal, wood or gas. They are famous bakers. The ovens have two burners and double walls, about which flues carry the heat twice.

The stove is complete in itself, fuel supply and all. Entirely portable, it can be placed for greatest advantage and comfort.

Some good dealer in your town sells Detroit Vapor Stoves. Ask him for a demonstration of how they "Work Like Gas."

How the Quake Crushed Guatemala

A Missionary's Personal Experience

KNOWING something of the spirit of the readers of the Christian Herald, and of the interest they have in the welfare of the needy, I have thought that it would be fitting to write something of the ruin of the City of Guatemala, Central America. I am a missionary who came to this country in 1901 and have come to love the country and the people. I am now working under the auspices of the Central American Mission, founded by the Rev. C. I. Scofield, D. D.

On the night of December 25 last, at about 10:25 o'clock, there came an earthquake that made most people believe that it would be safer outside of their houses than inside. It was a beautiful moonlit night, but rather cold. We are now in the dry season here. A series of earthquakes had begun on the night of November 17, and the quakes were so frequent that people were getting somewhat accustomed to them; but the one that came on Christmas night seemed to be of a different temper. The first shock did not destroy many houses, if any, although it is said that one house fell and crushed seven people to death. People rushed out into the streets and waited to see what would happen next. We live out of the city, yet not far from the railroad station and some of the busy sections. Mrs. Butler and I gathered up the two smallest children, and with the others we all rushed out into a little cement yard between two wings of the house. But we soon found we were not in a safe place, so we forced a little gate that let us out into the edge of a little forest of cedar that adjoins the house. We had only a little clothing, and were soon shaking from the cold—not freezing, but we are up at an altitude of nearly five thousand feet above sea level.

Many of the Catholic churches are wrecked. Walls that had been standing for hundreds of years were split and tumbled down; images of saints that had stood in their niches for decades, and before whom multitudes had prostrated themselves, now lie sprawling in the streets in ruins. The Presbyterian church, school and hospital are badly wrecked. The church building of the Central American Mission is so damaged that some of it will have to be taken down and rebuilt.

The heavy earthquake that came on January 3 shook down many houses that had stood the previous quake and damaged others so much that many believe it a very conservative estimate to say that ninety per cent. of the houses in Guatemala will have to be rebuilt from the ground. There are no houses for rent. Missionaries are outside, living under temporary shelters. Most of us missionaries believe that we should stay here and lay ourselves out in the work of the Lord. It is no time to run away.

Already supplies are being sent in by the Red Cross—corrugated iron roofing, tents and disinfectants and other things also.

SOON after the disaster, we missionaries held a meeting for consultation as to what we should and could do. We decided to send a cablegram to the Christian Herald and ask for help. Rev. W. B. Allison, of the Presbyterian Church, was chosen as the one to send the cablegram. He sent it and received for answer the word that a thousand dollars had been cabled. Hon. D. H. Scott, of Paris, Texas, treasurer of the Central American Mission, cabled a thousand dollars as soon as he heard of the disaster. We believe that God's people will respond liberally just as soon as they know the situation. Any one who would like to help the missionaries of the Central American Mission to build a sheet-iron house can send the funds to Mr. Scott, the treasurer, in care of the Christian Herald.

We sincerely hope that it will not be long before the Lord comes back to the world; but while he tarries let us press the battle.

WE spread out a pallet on the ground and huddled up close together. Truly it was something rather awesome, to lie out there on the ground and feel old Mother Earth heave, swell and tremble as if uncertain whether she should open her mouth and swallow us alive, or breathe hard and send us up into the heavens along with a stream of lava. We could hear the crash of falling buildings and the crying out of the people over in the city. Later on, two of the boys and I went back into the house to get more clothing, and we found that three of our beds were covered with bricks and wreckage.

Had it not been all so exciting, we would say that the hours dragged along; The dogs barked and vultures flew hither and thither; some birds wailing out a kind of weird shriek. We waited to see what the next morning would reveal. Morning came and people looked on the ruins of what had been the proudest city in Central America. Multitudes were doing what they could to rescue the most necessary things from their fallen homes. People who had feasted the day before now found themselves homeless and foodless.

People began to leave the city in any way they could. Some went on the train toward the Pacific Ocean. The railroad north, toward the Atlantic side, was put out of commission for several days. Some walked out while others went in carriages and mounted on horses or mules.

Out in the cemetery, scores of corpses had been tossed from the vaults where they had rested for a while. Relatives and friends reburied some of these remains, and others were burned.

THE president of the republic has been active in providing for the needs of the people, and now, at several different points, food is being distributed free. The parks have been given over for the building of temporary shelters. Little sheds of various descriptions crowd up close to one another. Some are built of wood, some of carpets, sheets, sacks, or corrugated iron, and some are walled in with pianos, wardrobes, organs, and almost anything one would ordinarily find in a home. There are people who have no covering

RAZORS

Take the Guesswork Out of Razor Buying

A man who is a good judge of a razor is won over instantly by a Genco. On the other hand, a man who has very little knowledge regarding the quality of a razor can purchase a Genco and rest assured that he has made a wise choice. There is no guesswork in buying a Genco Razor. Our 500 master cutlers have ground all the guesswork out of them.

"A Genco must make good or we will"

Every one carries this famous guarantee

Your dealer will be glad to show you Genco Razors because he knows that a Genco is going to give you many years of satisfaction.

If you do not shave yourself—get a Genco Razor and let your barber keep it for your own use. Then you'll always be sure of getting a smooth, clean shave, and it's the only sanitary way, too.

How To Order

If your dealer cannot supply you with a Genco Razor, send us $2.00. If your skin is tender or your beard wiry, better send $3.00 for the heavier, extra full concave Genco. Also ask for our booklet, "A Real Shave," which tells you what you should know about razor making, buying, and handling.

Dealers: We are furnishing every Genco Distributor—absolutely free—one of the beautiful display cases pictured above, in connection with our interesting selling proposition. Write us about it.

YOU WILL BE DELIGHTED WITH THE MANY VALUABLE REWARDS OF JOINING OUR FASCINATING PICTORIAL BIBLE COMPETITION

Gems of Priceless Value

YOU are indeed mistaken if you believe that the only benefits possible to receive from the $5,000.00 Bible Picture Study are Bible knowledge and cash prizes.

Participants who are now happily competing and those who took part in past Picture Studies tell us what an astonishing measure of benefits came from participation—valuable and almost priceless gains which surprised and delighted the entrants.

You yourself will find, when you enter the Picture Study, what a treasure house of rewards it is. You will find there the gems of improved memory, after you have traveled the path of seeking the best Bible verses for the 30 pictures. You will discover the jewels of increased ability to concentrate on any subject, after having put your mind to deciding which of the verses you have found fit the pictures best. Your conversation will begin to sparkle with the riches of an increased and improved stock of words, gleaned unconsciously from your concentration upon the wording of the greatest of all text books—the Bible. The active play of your intellect will be reflected in other tasks you undertake, and the influence of the Bible Picture Study will go with you into all your work.

Like a Golden Chain

I cannot refrain from writing you a bit, regarding the work you are doing through your paper. I find the "Picture Contest" a delight and helpful in more ways than one: it brings to the surface the beauty and helpfulness of many "gems" contained in the Book of Books; it arouses our minds to activity, that have more or less become dormant. It helps us to concentrate—to ferret out and bring to the surface the early Bible gems, once impressed on our memory, but now forgotten, because of the crowded everyday life of the present time. Surely the Christian Herald is doing a great work—reaching out through all the land—and each contestant like unto a link of a golden chain. I am glad to be one of those links, for I find the study delightful and profitable.—Mrs. H. C., Vt.

Counts His Many Gains

I wish to add a word of praise to that already written of the Bible Picture Contest. It has been a source of much pleasure and profit to me; among the things it has taught me are: To enjoy the riches and beauties of the Bible, as never before; concentration of thought, increased powers of observation, attention to details, and to exercise my judgment; to make decisions. I consider all these important—especially to young people. Then, too, the necessity to study the Bible in order to work out some of the pictures; all these things fix the mind with the truths and teachings of the Bible as nothing else can. I have enjoyed the Contest very much.—Mrs. C. N., N. C.

Much Helped in Memory

I do consider this a great work and a good thing for all of us. I am very much helped in my memory already. My age is seventy-five; am a widow and live alone, and oh, what company it has been for me these cold winter days and evenings. So thank you all who have been engaged in the starting of this great idea. Mrs. H. E. L., N. Y.

How You Will Compete

THE Bible Picture Study consists simply of 30 pictures, a short list of about 2000 Bible verses, and an Answer Book—nothing more.

You will look through the official selection of Bible verses, which we publish in handy form as our Reference Book, and select the Bible verses which in your opinion are best illustrated by the pictures.

Then you will write your chosen verses for the 30 pictures in your Answer Book, and send it in to us.

Those who submit the best verses for the pictures will be awarded the cash prizes listed below.

A GIFT FOR A NEW SUBSCRIPTION

If you send us a new 6-months' subscription for the Christian Herald, remitting the regular subscription price of $1.00, we will send you, postpaid, a complete Outfit for doing so. Ten cents added to this (a total remittance of $1.10) will bring a complete Outfit to the new subscriber also!

How to Get the Outfit

The complete Outfit for participating in the $5,000.00 Bible Picture Study consists only of the Reference Book, called International Bible Readings, with the Answer Book, and all 30 pictures. We guarantee all 30 pictures to all who order the outfit.

One of the offers to the left for the Christian Herald and the Outfit surely fits your needs. Decide upon one and send in your order at once.

The Reference Book, International Bible Readings, is not a haphazard selection of Bible verses, but the actual International Sunday School Lessons, Golden Texts and Daily Home Bible Readings, published in full, for the five months starting December, 1917, and going through April, 1918. Thus while competing in the Picture Study you will be memorizing the Bible stories chosen by the eminent Lesson Committee, and in the Reference Book you will have a helpful volume which you will treasure for itself.

Or if you secure the Outfit to give away, think what a joy the International Bible Readings will be to some one else, who perhaps may gain light and understanding from its pages.

Do not delay about obtaining the Outfit. Competition without expense is made possible under the rules free on request.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

AN old subscriber and a long-time member of the Prayer League noticed the omission of the column from a recent issue and wrote to the editor as follows:

"I can't help writing to mention what it (the Prayer League) has meant to me. One day, in perfect despair over the mental torture of a sister's suffering, I read through the requests for prayer and the answers to prayer. I was impelled to write and ask help for this sister. Later on I wrote to give thanks for her great improvement. For two years she has been in wonderful condition. From that time I have always turned to the Prayer League column first, and have devoted time in praying with the others for their sufferers. It has developed in me a power for answered prayer. I have been in communion with the Author of prayer in a way I never experienced before."

E. R. H. asks God's people to join her in prayer that her daughter may be restored to health. She also earnestly joined her prayers to those of the nation on the day when the President had called all Christians to pray for a righteous ending of this terrible world war.

"Praying Mother" testifies to three answered prayers. Over three years ago she asked prayers for a young man who was a slave of drink. He has not touched liquor for a long time, and his friends are proud of him. She also asked prayers for a young physician who had been led away by the reading of so-called "liberal" literature. He has since professed his faith in Jesus, but is still indifferent to the church and means of grace. Also for the wife of the same young physician, when she was desperately ill. Her life was spared, and it is hoped and prayed that she may be an instrument in God's hand to influence her husband. Now "Praying Mother" asks prayer for the gifted young wife of a minister, who is to undergo an operation, that if it be God's will her life may be spared. Lastly she prays for herself, that a great depression may be lifted from her spirits, and that God may sustain her by his grace while passing under this cloud.

A. Z. asks the prayers of the Prayer League in behalf of her sister, who has been made the victim of unprincipled men who have tried to secure possession of her property.

C. S. praises God for his presence and aid in bringing her and her child through the dark valley of death.

B. I. M. and family see the hand of God in protecting them from the bombs of the enemy during recent air raids on London and ask prayers that certain difficulties be resolved for them.

M. P. testifies to answered prayer in deliverance from sore financial straits, and thanks God for his wisdom and goodness in not answering a prayer, the granting of which would have resulted in a calamity.

Workers of the Bronx Gospel Hall of the National Bible Institute of New York are devoting two nights a week to prayer meetings in the homes of converts. At the close of the first meeting an Italian woman said: "I can't sit still any longer. This is my birthday, and it's the happiest one I have had since I have been here. I accept Jesus as my Saviour tonight, and I thank the Lord for bringing me here."

Mrs. L. G. A. asks prayer that a friend's mind may be restored, and that a son-in-law's wound may be healed.

S. M. C. had lost hope that she could ever be saved. She read some of the answers to people who felt they were lost. Now she feels that Jesus is her Saviour and trusts him all the time.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Rochester, N. Y.; Boyden Junction, Ga.; Mineville, N. Y.; South Leeds, Me.; New Orleans, La.; Spring Valley, Ohio; Chamberlain, S. D.; Kunsan, Korea (for a Spirit-filled revival among Korean Christians and missions, and that many souls may be converted during the coming year); Mrs. J. P., that the people of Khandesh, India, may repent of sin and not seek help of their idols; that they may come to Christ and find salvation; Wooster, Ohio (that many may be saved during revival); Clarksburg, W. Va. (that many may be saved during revival at the United Brethren church); Jackson, Minn. (that many may be saved during revival); Leonardville, N. Y. (that many may be saved during revival); Louisville, Ohio (that many may be saved during revival); Pittsfield, N. H. (that Sunday school scholars may be saved); Mrs. J. W. W., for an outpouring of God's spirit on the boys in the camps and trenches; Mrs. R. D. K., Bardolph, Ill., that a pastor may be sent to a Presbyterian church.

Mrs. J. H. C. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; M. C., that husband's mind may be restored; three friends, that their daughters' minds may be restored; C. N., that wife's mind may be restored; Mrs. I. H., that a nephew's mind may be restored; G. L., that a friend's mind may be restored; four friends ask prayer that their own minds may be strengthened.

Mrs. J. W. S. asks prayer that son's sight may be restored; Mrs. J. B., that husband's sight may be restored; seven friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives or friends.

Mrs. J. B. asks prayer that husband's hearing may be restored; eight friends, that their own hearing may be restored.

Fifty friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Fourteen friends ask prayer for special blessing for others; including Mrs. M. H. G., that our President may be guided in the right way by divine power.

E. A. O. asks prayer that a mother may be cured of the liquor habit; four parents, that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; M. D., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; C. J. S., that a man may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. A. L. H., that husband may be cured of the drug habit; Mrs. H., that son may be cured of the tobacco habit.

Ninety-eight friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. M. K., that daughter may pass safely through an operation; another, Mrs. E. B., that daughter may pass safely through an operation; twenty-five friends, for healing of self, including Mrs. W. M., that health may be restored without an operation; A. M. G. asks prayer to overcome nervousness; Mrs. C. S., that husband may be cured of cancer of the ear; Mrs. C. A Week in the World's News to create such new bureaus and divisions of departments as might seem necessary, to extend or limit the functions of existing bureaus, and to co-ordinate the work of all and put every branch of the government in step with every other branch. The powers granted by the bill were, however, so broad that many leaders in Congress declared that its passage would amount to the abdication by Congress of its constitutional powers. The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, where it was possible it might remain throughout the session. Meanwhile the Senate was discussing the bills designed to create the War Cabinet or a Munitions Director, the bills being supported by Senators Hitchcock and Wadsworth and the Administration being defended by Senator John Sharp Williams and others. Very little that was new was brought out in the additional speeches. Secretary of War Baker was heard further by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate on February 6, and was especially questioned regarding the possibility of getting to France the number of men he had indicated in his first statement before the committee. The Secretary reminded the committee that he had set that figure of 1,500,000 as the number that could be reached if ships could be obtained, and he insisted that he was still hopeful of success in securing the transportation, although he was not prepared to give definite figures. The testimony, however, made it apparent that in addition to the American ships now afloat there is to be a certain amount of tonnage transferred by the British admiralty to the American transport service, and American shipyards are depended upon to make up the balance of the needed tonnage.

TRANSPORTATION AND SHIPS. President Wilson himself on February 5 checked up personally the shipping problem, holding a conference with Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board. According to the figures furnished the President 1,000,000 men on the fighting front would require from 4,000,000 to 7,000,000 tons of shipping in continuous service. It was said that there was in sight available 4,000,000 tons, and that during the year from 3,000,000 to 6,000,000 tons more would be constructed. Chairman Hurley insisted that the patriotism and industry of American labor and the engineering skill and industrial equipment of the United States would produce the 6,000,000 tons.

GERMAN STRIKE BROKEN. Dispatches of February 5 and 6 from Berlin and adjoining neutral sources indicated that the radical measures taken by the military heads had restored normal conditions in the factories; but it was said that the methods adopted—the refusal to treat with the representatives of the strikers and the arbitrary military action—had not increased the confidence of the people in the government. Deputy William Dittman was tried by court martial for inciting to high treason and was given a sentence of five years' imprisonment with an additional two months for resisting public authority. Dittman denied that he had promoted the strike. He declared that the strike was only a demonstration against a peace with annexations and in favor of peace by understanding. The papers that published the details of Dittman's trial were suppressed.

GUILTY. In the criminal branch of the Federal District Court of New York on February 5 a jury found guilty of conspiracy against the commerce of the United States, Franz von Rintelen and ten others, mostly German subjects who had been charged, with him, with placing bombs on vessels outward bound from American ports. The court sentenced each defendant to serve eighteen months in Federal prison at hard labor and to pay $2,000 and costs.

MUCH TOO IDLE. The third of the "idle Mondays" found the transportation systems of the country still fighting against unusual cold, although storm conditions were not as bad as on the two previous Mondays. It had been hoped that Monday, February 4, might be the last on which the American industry would close down to give coal and transportation interests an opportunity to catch up. Because of the cold, however, the transportation interests lost rather than gained ground, especially in the neighborhood of New York, where ice conditions made navigation almost impossible, and it was announced that the Monday order would be continued for at least another week.

PERFECTING METHODIST UNION. The Methodist Unification Commission, after a two weeks' session at Savannah, Ga., completed its work on February 3. According to the plan all the negro churches would be organized into a general conference of their own, electing their own bishops and general officers. The various branches of Methodism would be divided into regional and subregional conferences, the whole being united under a constitutional council, which would have jurisdiction over all the subordinate conferences both in the United States and in the mission fields. The plan agreed upon must be ratified by the General Conferences of the two churches. The general conference of the Methodist Church which met in 1916 adjourned subject to the call of the chairman. It is probable that it will be reassembled in Atlanta in May to hold a joint conference with the General Conference of the Southern Church, at which the historic breach between these two great branches of Wesleyan Protestantism will be closed in a complete and vital union.

ASSEMBLY FOR 685,000. On February 4 Provost General Crowder announced that the last increment of the first draft of the National Army would begin to move toward the training camps on February 23, the movement continuing for five days and adding at its completion 685,000 men to the armies of liberty and democracy.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The first month of national operation of the railroads in spite of the storms and almost impossible weather resulted in the release of 4,000 cars and in an appreciable decrease in delayed exports, although 500,000 tons of ammunition for France were said to be still lying in American ports. . . . The eight-hour commission headed by General George W. Goethals reported to President Wilson early in February that the first year of operation of the Adamson law had not brought a general eight-hour day into railroad operation, but that it had increased the pay of the 400,000 trainmen about $60,000,000 a year, an increase of about 24.59 per cent. in wages. W. G. Lee, head of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, testifying before the Railroad Wage Commission on February 5, charged that the breakdown of the railroad systems of America, under the overload of war time requirements complicated with unseasonable weather, had been brought about intentionally in order to discredit the eight hour law and Federal control. . . . The government commission investigating the collision which resulted in the explosion in Halifax Harbor and the wrecking of the city held that Captain Lamodee and Pilot Mackay of the French munition ship Mont Blanc had violated the rules of navigation. The pilot and captain were arrested and charged with manslaughter. . . . The American Red Cross up to January 8, 1918, had appropriated for foreign relief work a total of $79,450,727.35, of which over $30,000,000 went for relief work in France. . . . The War Department on February 4 issued a warning to hunters against killing carrier pigeons of the racing homer type. It stated that any pigeon in the air might be a carrier pigeon under government supervision, and its killing might be a serious loss to the American army. . . . Plans were made by the Food and Fuel Administrations in February for the harvesting of a large additional amount of natural ice in order to save ammonia from ice-making to be used in the making of ammunition. . . . Ex-President Theodore Roosevelt was operated on at the Roosevelt Hospital in New York City on February 6 for the reduction of abscesses resulting from illness during his expedition to Brazil.

Progress of the War

NOW that Americans are holding their own sector of the battle line General Pershing's daily reports are carrying the names of men killed and wounded in action. The lists do not as yet indicate anything more than routine work. The American artillery has scored both on enemy attacks in formation which it dispersed and against airplanes which it drove back. At one point the Germans were forced by American artillery to abandon a section of their first line trench which American scouts reported as completely demolished. The American sector is now fairly well located as on the Eastern leg of the St. Mihiel salient, north of the Fortress of Toul which lies slightly west of Nancy. According to the newspaper correspondents some of the American trenches are not more than 60 feet from the Germans' first line, in some places lying in marshy ground with the Germans holding the dominating heights, although the German observation posts are under constant American artillery fire. The exact location of the American sector as well as its extent is not made public.

General Pershing on February 6 sent to the American people the message "Make a bridge of ships to France."

Maj. Gen. Peyton C. March, Chief of Artillery under General Pershing, will return to the United States to become acting Chief of Staff of the American Army, Gen. Tasker H. Bliss who holds the title of Chief of Staff being attached to the Supreme War Council.

Two American aviators made their first offensive flight on February 6 in company with a French bombing squadron. Returning from a successful trip behind the German lines a squadron of German planes was encountered and one of the American pilots attacked and destroyed a German machine. This being the first triumph of America's new air fleet.

Once more the week has passed with nothing more important than mutual trench raids and patrol engagements with a slight increase in air fighting but a considerable increase in the intensity of artillery duels, especially around Verdun and on that sector of the Italian front in which the Austro-Germans were recently driven back. Here the Italians, during the early part of the week completely repulsed a well organized counter-attack. Venice and other cities in its neighborhood suffered two air raids during the week. The damage was slight. Italian airmen in return bombed the enemy airdromes.

The week's toll of the submarine warfare was 10 British ships of over 1600 tons and 5 under. Italy lost one steamer under 1600 tons. The French lost two over that figure and one under. Secretary Daniels asserted on February 6 that while there was no patent cure for the submarine, the Allies were "getting the best of it." British reports coincided with the Secretary's statement, crediting the gain to new devices in use by the American ships.

General Maurice, after a month spent in visiting the fighting lines, told the Associated Press that in spite of transfers from the Russian front, the Allies were still stronger than the Germans on the Western front.

Berlin reported, on February 9, the conclusion of peace with the Ukraine.

Macbeth Lens

Light here is Illegal

Inefficient

Macbeth rays are Legal—Safe—

Taking Chances is Criminal

Wherever the protection of life is necessary you find Macbeth Lenses.

On the mighty dreadnaught these powerful lenses stand guard against night perils. On the sea mariners are warned of dangerous shoals by Macbeth Lenses flashing in light-houses.

Your safety driving an automobile at night demands this same high degree of lens efficiency.

Macbeth Lens gives you the light that's right—scientifically and legally right!

Forty years' experience is responsible for its perfection.

This lens complies with various state laws.

Laws demand the right kind of light—Macbeth gives it, all of it, on the road where you need it.

The green glass enameled visor is an integral part of the lens.

Macbeth Lens is the signal of safety and courtesy to other drivers, and dresses up your car, gives it a tone and a touch of distinction.

All the upward rays of light are re-directed down. This makes use of otherwise useless light; makes a safety of otherwise dangerous light.

The front surface of the Lens is divided into five horizontal prisms—each inclines at an angle determined with scientific accuracy.

These prisms re-direct the rays at the correct angle to give a long light, and concentrated brilliance on the road—not in the air or in the eyes of approaching drivers!

The concave recesses in the back of the lens spread the light laterally, thus providing the very essential side lighting to illuminate the edge of the road in turning corners.

Don't take chances with bright lights, dimmers or inferior lenses.

Get legal protection, greater safety and satisfaction by using Macbeth Lenses.

Macbeth Lenses for motor cars are made the same careful and scientific way as Macbeth searchlights and lenses for harbors, dreadnaughts and battleships.

Price per pair $5—Denver and West $5.50—Canada $6—Winnipeg and West $6.50

Macbeth Lenses are for sale by leading jobbers, accessory dealers and garages everywhere—If your dealer cannot supply you, write direct to us.

Front Wheel Control

Weed Chains on front tires of motor cars are as necessary as flanges on front wheels of locomotives

The front wheel skid is the greatest cause of the many automobile accidents which keep the newspaper columns sprinkled with harrowing accounts. Appreciating this fact The Scientific American in the following editorial advocates the use of Tire Chains on the front as well as rear wheels.

"The majority of automobile owners fit chains to the rear wheels only, and appear to consider this ample insurance against accidents from skidding, but this practice is a doubtful economy, for, although the rear wheels, thus armed, may hold the road fairly well, the really bad accidents too often result from the inability of the driver to control the course of his machine. Any old bicycle rider knows that he can retain the control of his machine and maintain his balance when the rear wheel skids badly as long as the front wheel holds its grip on the road, but that he becomes helpless whenever the front wheel slides. The same conditions are true in the case of the automobile, but in an exaggerated degree, for its weight and the average speed both tend to make the grip of the front wheels on the road precarious, and a skidding front wheel is not much different from a broken steering gear in the possibilities of disaster. Recognizing these facts, it is apparent that chains are fully as necessary on the front wheels as on the rear."

To use Weed Chains only on rear tires means to have your car only half protected. Put Weed Chains on all four tires at the first indication of slippery going and you will have quadruple protection against injury, death, car damage and law suits.

The refugee camp at Port Said, Egypt, where American dollars are saving Armenian and Syrian lives

Bible Lands in Hunger's Grasp

The Crisis Now at Hand in Famine Relief Work in Armenia, Syria and Palestine

"I AM hungry—oh, so hungry!" This plaintive cry arrested a missionary as he was passing through a deserted Armenian village. It came from the lips of a little child stretched out in a doorway. Too weak to keep up with the refugees, she had been left all alone to die of hunger. Four hundred thousand wretched little children like this one have been found and gathered into orphanages in Western Asia. In Lebanon alone they died at the rate of 1,000 a day last winter. Funds must be had at once if any are to be saved this year."

Such is a keynote of the bitter cries for help that are ringing out upon the world from Armenia, Syria, and even from Palestine itself. The devastation of these ancient lands is beyond description. The sufferings of their peoples are only beginning to be told.

Cable advices and letters received by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief show that the crisis of the suffering among the war refugees of Palestine and all the Near East is now being dealt with by the missionary workers. It is a bitter battle, in which hundreds of thousands of destitute have to be succored, in order to avert a tragic close to all the efforts that have been put forth in their behalf during the past months.

These messages show heartrending conditions among the destitute Syrians and Armenians, not only in Palestine, but in Gaza, Cairo and other points in Egypt. They tell of crowds crying for bread in Jerusalem—Jews and Christians together, starving on Christmas Eve; of unspeakable distress in Bethlehem (the name Bethlehem means House of Bread), where Christ was born.

THE city of Gaza has been almost wholly destroyed by the constant fighting which has taken place there since last April. Not a single roof has been left in place. The inhabitants have all been driven out, absolutely destitute.

After wandering about homeless and in the most deplorable condition for nearly three years, twenty-three survivors out of a total of 250 Armenian refugees from a village near Caesarea in central Asia Minor have just arrived at the Port Said refugee camp. The suffering these people have been through is beyond words.

Dr. Strymgeour, of the new government corps in Palestine, writes that wheat and bread are so scarce in Jerusalem that they can only be obtained at "famine prices" and that the shortage of fuel is most acute. Other advices from reliable missionaries, dated at the beginning of the year, stated that in Jerusalem wheat was $20 a bushel, flour $80 a barrel, potatoes $60 a bushel, bread 40 cents a pound, milk 40 cents a quart, sugar 26 cents a pound, and eggs 12 cents apiece. A later cablegram gives assurance that "though prices are high, it is possible to obtain supplies. MacFarland, unable months ago to make direct purchase of grain, now secures quantities wholesale. Opportunity for relief limited only by amount of funds at command." Through the relief committee grain is to be sold at cost price, or less than cost price, to the poor of Jerusalem and to those of the middle class who are in greatly straitened circumstances.

Reports from nineteen relief centers, cabled by Mr. Fowle, of the relief committee, are that "Funds so anxiously awaited by distributors bring life and hope to multitudes, especially thousands of orphans.

Work and workers everywhere are regarded as truly serving and are generally treated accordingly. Emphatic plea for doubled appropriations. Suffering appalling."

RELIEF that is systematic and effective is rapidly being organized all the way from Cairo to Jerusalem and beyond. The direct administration of the relief work in Palestine has now been centered in the Bishop McInnes Committee, which, since the British occupation by General Allenby, has been given official cooperation. Missionaries Hayman and Trowbridge have joined this committee. It is an excellent organization and its supervision is a guarantee that contributions will be used to the best advantage. Twenty-five thousand dollars of American funds were transferred to this committee on December 19.

A Jewish committee is now organized in Cairo for relief in Palestine, and, since the British Government favors the Zionist movement, it is expected that this Jewish Committee with its counterpart in Jerusalem, may be given equal privileges with the Bishop McInnes Fund, and may perhaps be organized with it in one relief administration under the military. A dispensary has been opened in Jerusalem with two native doctors in charge and a staff of nurses, but it is crowded far beyond its capacity. Dr. Lloyd, formerly the physician in charge of the Church Missionary Society Hospital in Omdurman, Sudan, has been doing very effective work in Khan Yunis, Deir Seneid and other points in Southern and Central Palestine. He is a very skilled doctor, knows Arabic well and has had ten years' experience in the Sudan. He is gradually working northward and eastward, as his medical unit is a mobile one, and he is thus able to care for the emergency cases. At the same time Dr. Strymgeour, who is an honorary member of Bishop McInnes' Relief Committee and holds a high post in the medical administration of Palestine, has established a valuable clinic in Jerusalem itself.

"There is the greatest need for relief in and about Aleppo," writes Mr. Fowle, "and it is there that the largest amount is expended under the able direction of a Swiss business man. An orphanage of about 1,000 children is the largest single relief measure. It costs about 25 piasters per day per child, and even then they work from morning to night. The orphanage uses a flour mill day and night, and makes its own bread. It also sells some with a profit. Other departments are shoe-making and repairing. Cows are kept and butter made for sale. Gardening for vegetables, which are peddled about town by the children, as well as used in the orphanage. Lace-making, weaving of cloths, barber shops, carpentering, etc. The orphanage occupies four large houses, one of which is given gratis by the Swiss director. On November 22 there were 100 children without beds (sleeping mattresses), and 150 in almost the same condition. Children and adults are coming back to the city in large numbers. From Aleppo, some of our funds are sent to a nearby place, where 180 children have, till now, been cared for by a young man whom I know. Herr Ehmann has about 600 children, as well as 50 college girls, and many poor. He wired November 22 for more money. Mr. Caldwell asks for an increased relief grant. They have laid in supplies for the poor. I can only say that we are all doing our best, and that everywhere our work and our workers—American, German, Swiss, Dane or Ottoman—are regarded as truly serving the needs of the poor, and in general are treated accordingly. In this city we are helping all nationalities and faiths, and hundreds of sick, of poor, and of children are tonight sheltered and fed as a result of what we have done."

What would you give to save them if these had been your babies?

IT is probable that a new city will be built to replace the destroyed Gaza, but in a more healthful location. Mejdell may temporarily be made the center of trade and government. Most of the people of Gaza will have to be cared for as refugees for some months, although the able-bodied among them will be provided with work.

The following messages were received from Dr. Chambers, missionary in Constantinople by way of Switzerland, February 4: "Workers in Turkey, despite privation, are being preserved in health and able to continue work. The attitude of the authorities is conciliatory, and there is no serious obstruction to the work. Orphanage work is steadily increasing in volume. Deported people are coming back in large numbers to the cities where they are easily reached. Work encouraging."

A letter received from Cairo, Egypt, Feb. 6, reads: "Miss Graffan, who is taking charge of over 250 orphans in Turkey, begs for larger appropriations. The increased cost of supplies makes it almost impossible for her to meet the constantly increasing demands of her work."

Rev. Stephen Trowbridge, chairman of the Committee for Relief in Egypt, writes, Jan. 1: "Somewhat more than 500 of the 4,000 Armenian refugees who were rescued two years ago last September and brought to Port Said, have found occupations outside and have left the refugee camp. . . . It is a great satisfaction that we have heard from Jerusalem that permits are being issued for Mr. Hooper, Dr. Lasbrey and Mr. Grace, all of Bishop McInnes' staff, to proceed at once to Jaffa to take charge of both the hospital and orphanage work, and to do whatever the military authorities desire in the way of general relief in the region surrounding Jaffa."

Mr. Trowbridge also writes that the Turks stripped the town of Jaffa, leaving the aged and children helpless. There are thousands of refugees in the city and diseases are rife. Three cases are cited to illustrate the present relief. A girl ten years old and her blind father are the sole survivors of a large family. A prominent Jew of Gaza was brutally shot by a Turkish captain and lay helpless in the street for three days. A Syrian, compelled by the Turks to handle dynamite, had both hands blown off, and his wife and four young children were found gaunt and wretched. Innumerable kinds of relief are required. The distress in Syria is authoritatively reported as very serious.

AN interesting feature reported by Mr. Trowbridge is the fact that Egypt, through the Coptic Church, is contributing help for the Palestine sufferers. In olden days, when there was famine in Palestine, there was "corn in Egypt," and it was the reliable source of supply. Today the Egyptian fund is already caring for 150 orphans in Jaffa, and will soon be ministering to thousands of the children throughout Palestine.

Stray refugee families need help in earning a living; some can get along if they have their rent paid for them; others have been helped by the donation of a sewing machine. They are then employed to make much needed garments for the Syrian Relief Committee and are thus enabled to support their own families, and at the same time help the destitute Syrians.

The Red Cross Committee reports that in Cairo the number of adults dependent upon the Diet Kitchen, established for the prevention of pellagra, is diminishing; there are now only 175, but the number of children in need of this extra food is increasing all the time.

"Monthly remittances are urgently solicited in order to carry on the work of relief in Palestine," Dr. Chambers cables from Geneva. "Generous gifts have been sent from England, but they are not nearly adequate to meet the pressing demands reported from the Lebanon District, where the distress of the refugees has reached the most appalling stages of starvation and disease."

Many readers of the Christian Herald have already given generously to this deserving relief work, but the urgency of the need and the fact that the situation, as presented by the missionaries, has become critical, makes a further appeal necessary. All gifts for the relief of Bible Land Sufferers should be sent to the Christian Herald which is co-operating with the Committees in the field. Relief sent quickly now will be of the utmost aid in saving precious lives.

IN ARMENIA

By Margaret E. Sangster

IT will be springtime soon, and springtime flowers
Will grow again upon each grassy hill,
And all the land will ring with mirth until
The world seems filled with joyous elfin bowers.
The apple blossoms, pink, in fragrant showers
Will seem like baby faces calm and still,
That sleep the sleep of peace and of good will
Through all the golden light of springtime hours.

And yet the springtime, in one foreign land,
Will bring no blossoms, and the babies there
Are pale and wan; they do not seem to care
That this is springtime. All they understand
Is that they suffer in the dusty heat,
And cry for bread when there is none to eat.

To Plow What Was "No Man's Land"

Fifteen Hundred American Tractors Will Help Produce 2,000,000 More Tons of Food in France

By HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr.

EDITOR'S NOTE: The idea of reinforcing the waning agricultural strength of France with American tractors originated with Henry Morgenthau, Jr., who writes this article. Mr. Morgenthau is the son of Henry Morgenthau, former American Ambassador to Turkey. The Food Administration has designated Henry Morgenthau, Jr., to follow the machines to France and put them in operation. This article, written just before Mr. Morgenthau left for Europe, will be followed later in the season by an account of how the tractors were managed and what they accomplished.

AMERICAN tractors—1,500 of them—sent by the U. S. Food Administration, will battle the hunger in France. When spring comes they will be in the field.

French crop production in 1917 was more than one-third less than in the year before the war. All able-bodied Frenchmen up to fifty years of age are fighting, and though the women, children and old men have made heroic efforts to maintain the agriculture of the country on a normal basis, the burden has exceeded their strength and endurance. One acre out of every four in France now lies idle from sheer lack of man and animal power to plow, seed and harvest crops upon it. So this expedition of 1,500 farm tractors and plows with experts to put them in operation, not only will increase the French harvest in 1918, but the presence of these powerful farm machines preparing their land for crops will cheer French hearts.

The first 100 tractors were sent to France on the deck of a naval transport and the entire number will reach there in plenty of time for spring plowing. They will operate mainly in the battle-scarred portion of northern France which has been re-taken from the Germans. There property lines have been largely obliterated. The fields are consequently large and the batteries of tractors will be able to work most effectively. Thus in a few months food crops, especially wheat and potatoes, will be growing in French soil plowed by American tractors—soil that a few months ago was the "No Man's Land" between the great battle-lines.

THE French have for several years been operating American-made tractors, and with characteristic thoroughness they have kept careful records of the work accomplished, fuel consumed, repairs and other details of the work. Satisfied with the general results, the French government by legal enactment January 2, 1917, created a credit of $6,000,000 for subsidizing agricultural co-operative societies and groups of farmers for the purchase of tractors. In some instances the government has advanced 40 per cent. of the price of the tractors to aid and encourage farmers in securing them. The tractors and plows are being purchased by the French High Commission with money loaned to them by the U. S. Treasury, and the expense of the mechanics who accompany them is being met by adding a lump sum to the purchase price of the tractors.

Judging from past experience these outfits will plow about half a million acres for wheat, potatoes and sugar beet this spring, and a million acres for fall planting of wheat. When operated in large fields, as in the re-conquered zone, the tractors work in batteries of ten, preferably all of the same make. With each battery there are ten drivers, two blacksmiths, two mechanics, one cook and a manager in charge, who has a clerk to assist him. In addition, there is a field man who lays out the work for the tractors, and several motor trucks which serve as workshops or for hauling provisions, repairs, fuel and supplies. Machines of medium size and relatively simple construction have been selected. They are of the 9-18 and 10-20 horsepower sizes. The plows used are self-lift gang plows having three 12-inch bottoms.

THESE batteries of tractors are subject to the orders of the Minister of Agriculture, notwithstanding the fact that 75 per cent. of the operators are soldiers. The problem of getting competent operators and mechanics has been one of the most difficult to solve. Mechanics at present employed on the batteries of tractors either are men relieved from military obligation, wounded men who have not regained their strength, or inexperienced young men below draft age. The Agricultural Service also has sought to employ as mechanics cripples from the re-education schools, who have studied mechanical courses for a few weeks.

The tractor expedition will include a limited number of experienced American mechanics, who will help supervise and instruct the French in the operation of the machines. It is planned to conduct American lines and to organize the 150 new batteries in the shortest time possible and also to assist the French Minister of Agriculture in distributing the tractors and operating them economically.

In addition to the beneficial effect the machines will have on the morale of the French people, the land plowed by the tractors in 1918 is expected to produce 1,500,000 tons of sugar beets and potatoes and 450,000 tons of wheat; and this increased production in France, amounting to nearly 2,000,000 tons of food, will obviate the sending of about 400 large shiploads from America through the perilous submarine zone.

Plowing the way to victory

President Wilson Replies to Teuton Spokesmen

WITHOUT previous notification, unexpectedly and somewhat dramatically, President Wilson appeared before Congress on February 11 and addressed the representatives of the Nation as follows:

Gentlemen of the Congress:

ON the 8th of January I had the honor of addressing you on the objects of the war as our people conceive them. The Prime Minister of Great Britain had spoken in similar terms on the 5th of January. To these addresses the German Chancellor replied on the 24th, and Count Czernin for Austria on the same day. It is gratifying to have our desire so promptly realized that all exchanges of view on this great matter should be made in the hearing of all the world.

Count Czernin's reply, which is directed chiefly to my own address on the 8th of January, is uttered in a very friendly tone. He finds in my statement a sufficiently encouraging approach to the views of his own Government to justify him in believing that it furnishes a basis for a more detailed discussion of purposes by the two Governments.

He is represented to have intimated that the views he was expressing had been communicated to me beforehand and that I was aware of them at the time he was uttering them; but in this I am sure he was misunderstood. I had received no intimation of what he intended to say.

Count von Hertling's reply is, I must say, very vague and very confusing. It is full of equivocal phrases and leads it is not clear where. But it is certainly in a very different tone from that of Count Czernin, and apparently of an opposite purpose. It confirms, I am sorry to say, rather than removes the unfortunate impression made by what we had learned of the conferences at Brest-Litovsk.

His discussion and acceptance of our general principles lead him to no practical conclusion. He refuses to apply them to the substantive items which must constitute the body of any final settlement. He is jealous of international action and of international council. He accepts, he says, the principle of public diplomacy, but he appears to insist that it be confined, at any rate in this case, to generalities, and that the several particular questions of territory and sovereignty, the several questions upon whose settlement must depend the acceptance of peace by the twenty-three States now engaged in the war, must be discussed and settled, not in general council, but severally by the nations most immediately concerned.

He agrees that the seas should be free, but looks askance at any limitation to that freedom by international action in the interest of the common order. He would without reserve be glad to see economic barriers removed between nation and nation, for that could in no way impede the ambitions of the military party, with whom he seems constrained to keep on terms. Neither does he raise objection to a limitation of armaments. But the German colonies, he demands, must be returned without debate. He will discuss with no one but the representatives of Russia what disposition shall be made of the peoples and the lands of the Baltic provinces; with no one but the Government of France the "conditions" under which French territory shall be evacuated; and only with Austria what shall be done with Poland.

In the determination of all questions affecting the Balkan States he defers, as I understand him, to Austria and Turkey; and with regard to the agreements to be entered into concerning the non-Turkish peoples of the present Ottoman Empire, to the Turkish authorities themselves. After a settlement all around, effected in this fashion, by individual barter and concession, he would have no objection, if I correctly interpret his statement, to a league of nations which would undertake to hold the new balance of power steady against external disturbance.

IT must be evident to every one who understands what this war has wrought in the opinion and temper of the world that no general peace, no peace worth the infinite sacrifices of these years of tragical suffering, can possibly be arrived at in any such fashion. The method the German Chancellor proposes is the method of the Congress of Vienna. We cannot and will not return to that.

What is at stake now is the peace of the world. What we are striving for is a new international order based upon broad and universal principles of right and justice—no mere peace of shreds and patches. Is it possible that Count von Hertling does not see that, does not grasp it, is, in fact, living in his thought in a world dead and gone? Has he utterly forgotten the Reichstag resolutions of the 19th of July, or does he deliberately ignore them? They spoke of the conditions of a general peace, not of national aggrandizement.

The peace of the world depends upon the just settlement of each of the several problems to which I adverted in my recent address to the Congress. I, of course, do not mean that the peace of the world depends upon the acceptance of any particular set of suggestions as to the way in which those problems are to be dealt with. I mean only that those problems each and all affect the whole world; that unless they are dealt with in a spirit of unselfish and unbiased justice, with a view to the wishes, the natural connections, the racial aspirations, the security and peace of mind of the peoples involved, no permanent peace will have been attained.

They cannot be discussed separately or in corners. None of them constitutes a private or separate interest from which the opinion of the world may be shut out. Whatever affects the peace affects mankind, and nothing settled by military force, if settled wrong, is settled at all. It will presently have to be reopened.

Is Count von Hertling not aware that he is speaking in the court of mankind, that all the awakened nations of the world now sit in judgment on what every public man, of whatever nation, may say on the issues of a conflict which has spread to every region of the world? The Reichstag resolutions of July themselves frankly accepted the decisions of that court. There shall be no annexations, no contributions, no punitive damages. Peoples are not to be handed about from one sovereignty to another by an international conference or an understanding between rivals and antagonists. National aspirations must be respected; peoples may now be dominated and governed only by their own consent. "Self-determination" is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action, which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril.

We cannot have general peace for the asking or by the mere arrangements of a peace conference. It cannot be pieced together out of individual understandings between powerful States. All the parties to this war must join in the settlement of every issue anywhere involved in it, because what we are seeking is a peace that we can all unite to guarantee and maintain, and every item of it must be submitted to the common judgment whether it be right and fair, an act of justice, rather than a bargain.

THE United States has no desire to interfere in European affairs or to act as arbiter in European territorial disputes. She would disdain to take advantage of any internal weakness or disorder to impose her own will upon another people. She is quite ready to be shown that the settlements she has suggested are not the best or the most enduring.

But she entered this war because she was made a partner, whether she would or not, in the sufferings and indignities inflicted by the military masters of Germany against the peace and security of mankind; and the conditions of peace will touch her as nearly as they will touch any other nation to which is intrusted a leading part in the maintenance of civilization. She cannot see her way to peace until the causes of this war are removed, its renewal rendered, as nearly as may be, impossible.

This war had its roots in the disregard of the rights of small nations and of nationalities which lacked the union and the force to make good their claim to determine their own allegiances and their own forms of political life. Covenants must now be entered into which will render such things impossible for the future and those covenants must be backed by the united force of all the nations that love justice.

If territorial settlements and the political relations of great populations which have not the organized power to resist are to be determined by the contracts of the powerful Governments which consider themselves most directly affected, as Count von Hertling proposes, why may not economic questions also? It has come about in the altered world in which we now find ourselves that justice and the rights of peoples affect the whole field of international dealing as much as access to raw materials and fair and equal conditions of trade.

Count von Hertling wants the essential bases of commercial and industrial life to be safeguarded by common agreement and guarantee; but he cannot expect that to be conceded him if the other matters to be determined by the articles of peace are not handled in the same way as items in the final accounting. He cannot ask the benefit of common agreement in the one field without according it in the other. I take it for granted that he sees that separate and selfish compacts with regard to trade and essential materials of manufacture would afford no foundation for peace. Neither, he may rest assured, will separate and selfish compacts with regard to provinces and peoples.

Count Czernin seems to see the fundamental elements of peace with clear eyes, and does not seek to obscure them. He sees that an independent Poland, made up of all the indisputably Polish peoples who lie contiguous to one another, is a matter of European concern, and must, of course, be conceded; that Belgium must be evacuated and restored, no matter what sacrifices and concessions that may involve; and that national aspirations must be satisfied, even within his own empire.

If he is silent about questions which touch the interest and purpose of his allies more nearly than they touch those of Austria only, it must, of course, be because he feels constrained, I suppose, to defer to Germany and Turkey in the circumstances. Seeing and conceding, as he does, the essential principles involved and the necessity of candidly applying them, he naturally feels that Austria can respond to the purpose of peace as expressed by the United States with less embarrassment than could Germany. He would probably have gone much further had it not been for the embarrassments of Austria's alliances and of her dependence upon Germany.

AFTER all, the test of whether it is possible for either Government to go any further in this comparison of views is simple and obvious. The principles to be applied are these:

First—That each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of that particular case and upon such adjustments as are most likely to bring a peace that will be permanent.

Second—That peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game, now forever discredited, of the balance of power; but that,

Third—Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims among rival States; and,

Fourth—That all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe, and consequently of the world.

A GENERAL peace erected upon such foundation can be discussed. Until such a peace can be secured we have no choice but to go on. So far as we can judge, these principles that we regard as fundamental are already everywhere accepted as imperative except among the spokesmen of the military and annexationist party in Germany. If they have anywhere else been rejected the objectors have not been sufficiently numerous or influential to make their voices audible. The tragical circumstance is that this one party in Germany is apparently willing and able to send millions of men to their death to prevent what all the world now sees to be just.

I would not be a true spokesman of the people of the United States if I did not say once more that we entered this war upon no small occasion and that we can never turn back from a course chosen upon principle. Our resources are in part mobilized now, and we shall not pause until they are mobilized in their entirety. Our armies are rapidly going to the fighting front, and will go more and more rapidly. Our whole strength will be put into this war of emancipation—emancipation from the threat and attempted mastery of selfish groups of autocratic rulers.

We are indomitable in our power of independent action, and can in no circumstances consent to live in a world governed by intrigue and force. We believe that our own desire for a new international order, under which reason and justice and the common interests of mankind shall prevail, is the desire of enlightened men everywhere. Without that new order the world will be without peace and human life will lack tolerable conditions of existence and development. Having set our hand to the task of achieving it, we shall not turn back.

I hope it is not necessary for me to add that no word of what I have said is intended as a threat. That is not the temper of our people. I have spoken thus only that the whole world may know the true spirit of America—that men everywhere may know that our passion for justice and for self-government is no mere passion of words, but a passion which, once set in motion, must be satisfied. The power of the United States is a menace to no nation or people. It will never be used in aggression or for the aggrandizement of any selfish interest of our own. It springs out of freedom and is for the service of freedom.

The Kaiser's Way to Peace

ON the same day that the President thus again proclaimed the charter of the world's liberty, Kaiser Wilhelm succinctly expressed to the Burgomaster of Hamburg the attitude of Germany's ruling class, closing thus a short statement, in which he admitted "We often entered false paths":

"We ought to bring peace to the world. We shall seek in every way to do it. Such an end was achieved yesterday in a friendly manner with an enemy which, beaten by our armies, perceives no reason for fighting longer, extends a hand to us, and receives our hand. We clasp hands. But he who will not accept peace, but on the contrary declines, pouring out the blood of his own and of our people, must be forced to have peace. We desire to live in friendship with neighboring peoples, but the victory of German arms must first be recognized. Our troops under the great Hindenburg will continue to win it. Then peace will come."

Scotland Honors Tuscania's Dead

OUT from a little Scotch seaport as yet unnamed went on February 12 a slow procession. Down from the overhanging clouds came copious showers of rain, and the little procession was shrouded in a clinging mist as it climbed the low cliffs of the coast to the last resting-place upon the seaward-looking crest.

An auto truck came first. In it were seventeen bodies which the sea had returned of those which it had taken from the ill-fated Tuscania. Following the truck marched a squad of khaki-clad American soldiers, and then came hundreds of villagers, anxious to show the utmost respect to the soldiers of the cousinly Republic over seas. One of the villagers bore the Union Jack and one of the soldiers the Stars and Stripes.

In one long trench they placed the seventeen bodies. The soldiers sang the Anthem of the Free, and when the notes of "The Star-Spangled Banner" had died away the Scots sang "God Save the King." Then across the grave rang out those parting shots which speed upon their way the souls of soldiers dead, and as the frozen clods fell upon the coffins of these brave boys the number of the Tuscania's dead who had been buried reached 171. One grave held forty-nine of the crew and passengers of the torpedoed liner. Careful records were kept of all the bodies buried, each body being numbered and each being placed in a separate coffin, but because it had not been the business of any particular officer to see that it was done, the identification tags of many of the bodies belied their names, since they carried no number by which they could perform their office; hence in every grave a certain number of coffins were listed each as bearing the remains of an "unidentified private." For each of these unknowns a mother's heart somewhere was breaking.

On February 13 the War Department estimated the probable loss of American soldiers on board the ship at not more than 170; 260 of those aboard were unaccounted for, but in dispatches to the department the names of more than 260 had come garbled so they could not be deciphered, and, allowing for duplications, it was expected that the straightening out of these names would eliminate the list of unaccounted for.

In a telegram to the War Department General Pershing gave high praise to the British War Office for its efficient cooperation in the rescue of the survivors of the Tuscania, including in his commendation the Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross.

A British colonel at the Scotch port first mentioned announced, on February 12, that the people of the nearby countryside had started a public subscription to erect a permanent monument to the Americans.

American army officers in cooperation with the British War Office arranged for the creation of a camp in Ireland near the point where the majority of the survivors were landed. In this camp the men were expected to rest for a few weeks.

A Week in the World's News

FULL SPEED AHEAD. It was officially announced on February 13 that the order providing for heatless and workless Mondays had been suspended, but that the preference list for coal deliveries was to be continued, and that the embargoes against shipment of certain classes of freight would also be continued. The State Fuel Administrators were still left with authority to continue the heatless Mondays within their own states if conditions made it necessary. A week of moderate weather without storms, coupled with strenuous and cooperative efforts of the Fuel and Railroad Administration, was said to have resulted in a very material improvement in the car situation, congestion being greatly relieved and the movement of freight facilitated, although it was said that there would be somewhat of a shortage of fuel during the balance of the winter, resulting in temporary inconvenience to those industries not included under the preference.

COMPROMISE ON WAR CABINET. A conference on February 13 between the wages in all yards could be standardized, greatly simplifying the whole problem, and placing the employees directly in the government service. In this situation, where patriotism would be expected to overcome the restriction on individual effort sometimes laid by union rules, definite charges are made that the men are being prevented from giving the full service of which they are individually

WASTING MILLIONS. It having been charged that the work of building the shipyards at Hog Island, near Philadelphia, for which the American International Corporation has the contract, had been carried on with great waste of money and with prodigious expenditures for land and materials and with fabulous profits to contractors, President Wilson, on February 14, instructed the Attorney General to make a thorough investigation "with a view to instituting criminal process in case the facts justified it."

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Post-office Department on February 12 called for bids for five airplanes, which when delivered will be used to institute an airplane mail service between Washington, Philadelphia and New York. The planes are to be delivered no later than April 25. . . . The House of Representatives on February 12 passed a bill already approved by the Senate appropriating $50,000,000 to provide housing facilities for employees of shipyards working on government contracts. . . . United States Secret Service men examined the crew and passengers of the Holland American liner Nieuw Amsterdam with great care. When the liner reached port early in February she was put under guard. No persons were permitted to communicate directly or indirectly with any person on the ship until each had been examined and had satisfied the agents of the government as to his purpose in visiting America. The care thus taken was due to information that a representative of the German spy system was on board, and the careful search was rewarded by the apprehension of Reint Sobering, a German subject who was a second steward on the liner, and who was detected trying to hide an envelope, which he said had been given to him by a married sister in Rotterdam, to be delivered to a person in the United States whom he did not name, his sister having told him that the note was a love message from a friend in Germany to her fiancé in the United States. The contents of the envelope were found to be a new secret code for use by the German spy system in the United States. . . . At the meeting of the Republican National Committee in St. Louis on February 13 Will H. Hays of Indiana was elected chairman, succeeding Chairman Willcox, who resigned. . . . Following persistent but premature reports of his death on February 11, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, convalescing at Roosevelt Hospital, continued making steady improvement toward ultimate recovery. . . . Arrangements have finally been completed for the mutual drafting in Canada, England and the United States of men of these nations liable to military service and resident in any of the others. . . . Railway shop men were announced, on February 13, to be seeking an increase in wages that would amount to $82,000,000 for the whole country. It was declared that men were leaving the railroads for better paid industries, and the experience of one railroad was cited which had hired 8,200 men within a certain period, losing within the same period 8,700. . . . Abdul Hamid II, 34th Sultan of the Ottoman Empire and the 28th to rule in Constantinople, who was deposed in 1909 by the revolt of the young Turks, died on February 11 at Constantinople from inflammation of the lungs. He reigned as Sultan from 1876 to 1909; reigning during the disastrous war with Russia in 1877-78.

HIGH COMMISSIONER REACHES AMERICA. Earl Reading, Lord Chief Justice, British High Commissioner, and Special Ambassador to the United States, landed at an American port on February 9. In a statement made to representatives of the press he praised President

President and Senate leaders of both parties resulted in practical agreement as to the terms of the bill which would provide for the necessary speeding up of War Department machinery and that measure of reorganization requisite to the proper conduct of war operations. It was suggested that the bills introduced by Senator Chamberlain for the War Cabinet and for a Munitions Director would probably be dropped and that the bill introduced by Senator Overman would be rewritten so that it would give the President power to reconstruct the War Department without any sacrifice of power or prerogative on the part of the legislative branch of the government. Leaders of both parties predicted the early passage of the compromise measure.

Senator Baker announced on February 10 the division of the General Staff of the Army into five bureaus, each to be under an executive officer, such officer having direct power and being responsible to the Chief of Staff. The new divisions were named as follows: The Executive Division, the War Plans Division, the Purchase and Supply Division, the Storage and Traffic Division, and the Army Operations Division.

GOVERNMENT MAY TAKE SHIPYARDS. With 5,000 carpenters on strike in shipyards working on government contracts, and with a threat of the possible extension of the strike until it would include 50,000, the suggestion was made in Washington that the government use the power of the Shipping Board and commandeer all the shipyards of the country, thus bringing the whole labor question directly into government hands. Labor at present in the yards is dissatisfied, wage increases of from 40 to 60 per cent. being demanded. With the yards in private hands operating under variously phrased contracts, the adjustments necessary to equalize these wage increases are greatly complicated. With unified government operation, however, capable. Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board on February 14 addressed a telegram to the President of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, warning him that the shipyard strikes were equivalent to the severing of the lines of communication with the troops in France, and asking him if he thought that the fathers and mothers whose sons were making the sacrifice at the front would be willing to sit patiently by and permit such a paralysis of the life line between here and the boys "over there." Without threatening, Chairman Hurley advised that the shipyard strikes be brought to an end. At the same time draft boards called before them striking workmen, the inference being that strikers could not expect exemption from the draft granted to shipyard workers. This action of the draft boards was resented by the men and disapproved by the Shipping Board. In reply to Chairman Hurley's telegram the head of the carpenters' union replied that while he did not approve of the local strikes he was powerless to prevent them. He suggested that the obligation to consider the element of patriotism rested equally upon the employers and that it was unfair to ascribe unpatriotic motives to workers seeking to remedy unfair conditions. A suggestion that labor for the yards be conscripted was opposed ardently by Samuel Gompers, who declared it repugnant to all ideals of free government.

It appeared probable, on February 16, that President Wilson would give the shipyard problem his personal attention. Representatives of the unions were said to have indicated that the present difficulty could be solved and future trouble avoided by establishing a uniform wage in all yards, by cutting out profiteering at the root, and by improving transportation so that the supply of materials would be adequate, enforced idleness for lack of material being a potent factor in discontent.

The Biggest Business

GREAT as are our commercial ventures, imposing as are our financial institutions, far reaching as are our trade relations, there is a business greater than all: the Business of Making Christians. Next week Edward S. Babcox, a layman who sees in large measures the things of the kingdom, will unveil for us some elements of this greatest business. Next week also Rev. Alexander Robertson, D. D., of Venice, who told us how Venice kept aerial watch, will tell us how Venice faced the danger and stripped for defense.

Frank Carpenter has found a lot of interesting buildings in Washington. Over parks and upon open spaces have sprouted office buildings that grew overnight. But we will leave it to him to tell you about it. Dr. Jowett's March message is to those who have "no oil" in their lamps. The center plate of pictures will next week appear in that most wonderfully faithful reproduction known as Rotogravure which will be its manner of dress from this time on.

The Redeeming of a Pirate Land

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

ABOUT fifty miles south of the mouth of the Yangtse and just outside the wide mouth of Hangchow Bay lie the Chusan Islands, like irregular-shaped potatoes heaped into the big end of a funnel. On the map the islands look like small dots in the vast expanse of blue sea; but when the small, filthy steamer noses its slow way among them, one wonders where the channels lie; for the sharp hills pile up on all sides, and their broad slopes, covered with garden-like fields of wheat, beans and buckwheat, seem to shut off every exit from the fine harbors.

In the "good old days," when England found land-grabbing easier than modern nations find it, she occupied the islands. Sir Hugh Gough was the leader of the party of occupation, twenty years before America had burst into war over slavery. But Dr. Lockhart, a medical missionary, had preceded the military party by a whole year; and here, among the island homes of the Chinese pirates, he established the first missionary work in China north of Canton. Milne came two years later, and in the city of Dinghai, where I have just been photographing Buddhist priests and showy Buddhists—Gutzlaff tried to hold Christian meetings but failed. The Chinese in this beautiful archipelago were friendly to foreigners even at that early date, though it was too early for evangelistic work. But it was only a few months later that a missionary named Cole established in the town of Dinghai a printing office, with a type foundry and both English and Chinese type, thus attempting to bring back to the land of the earliest block type the enlightening influence of the printed word.

Dr. Goddard of the Baptist mission was the next worker of importance, and to this day the Chinese tell of the loving service of the man. To-day the work among these charming islands is in the hands of Mr. L. C. Hylbert, and there is only one missionary society, with eight stations, at work among the 300,000 people who live in the archipelago.

Elizabeth, the four-and-a-half-year-old daughter of Mr. Hylbert, cuddled up into my lap before sunrise this morning and said, "I don't like to have my papa go away so much," and I sympathized with her. Mr. Hylbert spent one week at home during the last two months, and even these hurried visits were filled with executive work and provisioning for the next trip.

We came out from Ningpo this morning on the rolliest, filthiest old tub that ever veered her way through narrow channels and bumped with a thud against a floating wharf. Ten of us occupied a tiny room, where every occupant tried to see what made my typewriter print, and where every window was filled with one or more swarthy heads, with bulging eyes and open mouths. I mention this because it proves that the Chinese are as curious as Americans are, but without the restraints that the well-bred impose on themselves for the sake of appearances.

At one landing-place I saw where a group of pirates were shot a year or so ago. Mr. Hylbert missed the performance because the boat reeled away from the port just before the firing squad did its work. But there were some Chinese junks lying in the roadstead, with the flag of the Chinese navy fluttering at hills, lie the villages of the islands. The orchards produce luscious oranges and the islands form the poultry district for Ningpo and Shanghai. But salt and fish are the main products. The salt is derived from sea water by natural evaporation and subsequent refining. The water is pumped upon sandy fields, on which there soon forms a white crust of salt, which is scraped off and thrown into vats filled with straw. Water is poured in and the brine drips down through the straw filter, leaving the sand on top of the straw. One dealer bought one hundred thousand dollars' worth of salt from one single island in one year, so it seems that as long as the ocean does not run dry Chusan will not starve. As the salt gabelle is one of the main sources of Chinese revenue, this industry is a considerable factor in national credit.

Ningpo is the third greatest fish-market in the world, and smells as though it were the greatest. Ten thousand ships sail out from this port, and this means that seventy thousand men gain their living from the sea. But Ningpo is only the market for the fleets that have the Chusan Islands as a home base. Whole hill-sides can be seen covered with drying fish, which later go to all parts of China. All the boarding-houses in America could not use this finny mass in fishballs, and the number of prunes required as dessert for the meal would keep California so busy raising them that they would have no time to worry over race questions. The most common kind of fish is a tapefish which looks as if it were painted with aluminum paint and seems to be as meaty as a rawhide shoe-lace.

Eight steamers a day stop here at Dinghai, and the harbor opposite the city is as fine as any on the Asiatic coast. Archdeacon Moule, an Englishman, asks: "What if that occupation under Sir Hugh Gough had been permanent and England's authority had been paramount over the beautiful archipelago? England would have had her left hand on the central pulse of China's great artery, the Yangtse, and her right hand within striking distance of Japan." English churchmen have a wonderful knowledge of strategy, and the saddest word of England is that which concerns some small island which was not incorporated in the greatest empire on earth in time to avoid international jealousy.

MR. HYLBERT is getting the Chinese gentry interested in the day-school at Dinghai. The Christian day-school which has been established there has so far surpassed the other schools that several influential men are considering as to how the work can be enlarged. This morning we have been inspecting possible locations. One is an old, tumble-down official residence of former days, which can be rented for five dollars a month. Beside it is another official residence, which cannot be rented but can be bought. The buildings of both pieces cover the greater part of an acre and a half.

The Spirit of Forgiveness

ARE we not to forgive others as we expect to be forgiven? How does God forgive? When you walked on the sands of the seashore, you noticed that the next rolling billow washed away all the prints of your footsteps. Is it not so that the blood of Jesus washes away all the stains of sin? Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though red like crimson, they shall be as wool. Scarlet and crimson are considered ineradicable colors. Blood is the bleacher that makes them white. Christ's sacrifice is the antitoxin for the poison of sin. He is the Lord, your Healer, that you may be made blameless, without spot or wrinkle.

God forgives forever. He sinks our sins, like a millstone, in the bottom of the sea. The ocean of His love flows over them in eternal oblivion. He will never make mention of them again, for they are separated as far as the East is from the West—an infinite distance. They are hidden in the land of annihilation.

Can we forgive men their trespasses as God forgives us? Can we be like Him? Christ is made sin for us; by His stripes we are healed; therefore, God, the Father, can tear the black page from the Book of Life, blotting out our sins as a thick cloud. He turns His back upon our past, taking the forgiven soul into His arms of tenderness as a mother would a child.

Forgiveness, it is said, is the odor which flowers yield when trampled upon. The poet truly says,

The sandal tree perfumes, when riven,
The axe that laid it low;
Let man, who hopes to be forgiven,
Forgive and bless his foe!

Should we not, like our Lord, pray for those who spitefully use us, loving our enemies and blessing them that curse us, as Christ did on Calvary? Behold, your Saviour, beaten with rods, crowned with thorns, mangled with nails, what is His cry? "Father, forgive them!" His blood flowed for pardon, He rises from the tomb to forgive, He ascends to heaven, to be the pleading Intercessor for guilty souls.

What kind of a world would earth become without forgiveness? Adam fell; Abraham lied; David sinned; Peter denied; Paul murdered; all the disciples forsook Jesus and fled. What if there were no mercy enduring forever, no hope, big with immortality, no peace, like a gentle river? Could God be just and continue the creation of man through all the centuries, with no possibility of restoration and pardon? Such a condition is unthinkable. The Cross is the golden glory of the world's hope; the Christ is the infinite Forgiver and Saviour; through Him, man is redeemed and enters a more glorious Eden, the very Paradise of God.

The Hope That Lies Beyond

IN one of his wonderful allegories, Turgeneff, the famous Russian author, gives a dialogue between two mountains, the Jungfrau and the Finsteraarhorn. These giants have been asleep, waking only at long intervals during which ages pass. The elder mountain, the Finsteraarhorn, tells what he sees from his outlook in cloud-land: ice and snow everywhere, over hill and valley and woodland—eternal ice and snow. And they sleep again. Ages pass and they reawaken. The older mountain takes up the interrupted theme to tell the lesser that woods, trees, verdure and shining lakes are now visible, with little creatures dotting the landscape, which he calls human beings. Again slumber and an awakening. Further ages have passed. The human multitudes have increased and are in conflict. They sway and surge in the struggle, and the air is fouled with smoke. Across the valleys and streams and along the sides of the everlasting hills the conflict rages, leaving in its train the prostrate victims. The wise old peaks speculate on this sight which they cannot understand, and again resume their slumbers. Once more they awaken in the bright sunrise, and the Jungfrau asks her companion what is visible below. "Ice everywhere; clear, sparkling ice and snow—the eternal snow. All the rest is gone." "It is well," says the other mountain, "let us resume our sleep."

Turgeneff's fable—many may recall the story, for it is not new—emphasizes the feebleness of the race of men and the pettiness of all their ambitions, set beside the tremendous forces of nature and with the power of Omnipotence overshadowing all things, capable of imposing eternal silence with a gesture. An ever increasing number of earnest souls, like sentinels upon the heights, yet not uncomprehending, are watching the struggle. Above all the material surroundings, they are catching glimpses of a spiritual warfare. They see in the surging of the millions yearning for freedom and justice and peace, and dying for it, a picture of the upward struggle of the race. They feel that in this conflict there is, in the tremendous suffering and sacrifice, an expression of the great desire which God has planted in the hearts of men for a better world. They feel that the spiritual forces are working on the souls of men. Always the upward struggle must be accompanied by sacrifice. At every step, this has been the history of human effort since the beginning of things. This further vision, which grows with increasing clearness as the war draws to a conclusion, is influencing men more and more. They are getting increase of faith in God's good providence, which will make even the tides of human conflict work out His plans.

And this is what we mean when we speak about a better world after the war. How can it be otherwise? It must be a world in which there will be a more general recognition of justice, of truth, of human liberty, of equality—a world that will come back to God as the sovereign of the universe, and to Jesus Christ as the Saviour of men. This is the inspiration that comes to all thoughtful Christian people, who are balancing up the gains and losses of the war. Not a new map of Europe or Asia, nor a new distribution of governments and boundary lines, but a world that shall be glad to fling away its idol-worship of wealth and power and militarism and commercial supremacy, and whose peoples will be ready and willing to co-operate in all that makes for human betterment and Christian civilization.

We are receiving many letters inquiring as to the outlook after the war. Roughly sketched, this is the outlook as we have given it above. We rejoice that America, more than any other of the nations, has sounded the clear note of hope, and of confidence in world betterment when the struggle is over.

Abdul Hamid

WELL-NIGH forgotten by the world, since the revolution which resulted in his dethronement in 1908 the rejected Sultan Abdul Hamid is dead in his prison. He was in his day the most cordially hated of monarchs. Cruel, crafty and fanatical, his reign was marked by a series of massacres in the name of religion, which have hardly been equalled in any age. Many readers of the Christian Herald will remember his treatment of the Bulgarians and Armenians, thousands of whom were ruthlessly slaughtered by his fanatical adherents, the mandate for their execution having gone forth from Yildiz Kiosk. Jews, Greeks and Syrians also were robbed and hounded to death, and their possessions seized. Those were times of grave peril for the American missionaries in the Near East. No life was safe—either of man or woman—in all Asia Minor and in European Turkey and its dependencies. Yet though European conferences stormed at the outrages by "the unspeakable Turk," they did virtually nothing to stay Abdul's hand. His final overthrow came from his own subjects, who were sick of his ill success in diplomacy and war. In his reign the Ottoman power began to crumble. Egypt, Bulgaria, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Crete and other territorial possessions slipped out of his grasp and were lost irredeemably. The empire shriveled and the disintegrating process has been continued. Palestine and the Caucasus are lost to Turkey, while the tribesmen of Arabia, and even the "sacred cities" no longer recognize the authority of the Sublime Porte.

"The evil that men do lives after them," Abdul dead, will be remembered by the Turks as the one who stripped the Sultanate of its ancient power and privileges and brought many evils upon the nation; but by the Christian world he will be remembered as the butcher who made Armenia a shambles.

How Every Woman Can Help

RATHER confusing is the news that six states are doing 75 per cent. of the country's food saving work. There must be something wrong somewhere, if this estimate be true. There must be extraordinary indifference, or neglect, in some localities. Food Administrator Hoover has put the situation very clearly in his telegraphed message to the New York Committee of Women on National Defense. "To furnish food to our army and to a world of women and children abroad," he writes, "requires two things: ships and food itself. Providing the ships is the duty and work of the government, but providing the food is the duty and work of each and every one of us. All that we can send until the next harvest must come from the savings of the people, from the little savings of each of us, all added together. This great food problem will be solved, if we all contribute our part, according to our means."

This message applies with equal force to the women of the whole country—mothers and daughters, mistresses and servants, in homes, hotels, boarding-houses, restaurants. In this conservation campaign, the women are supreme; they can make it a triumphant success if they will. It is very definite war service, and great issues hang upon its faithful and efficient performance.

The Christian Herald would urge that in every home which it enters, these facts should be kept in mind, and constantly in view as well, in order that the nation's food conservation program may be helped to attain complete success. "Service," it has been well said, "is the keystone of the victory arch in this war," and the part that is being played by our loyal mothers, wives and daughters is the heart of the keystone itself.

The Inland Waterways

IT is announced that under government control of the transportation facilities of the country a far-reaching program of development of the inland waterways will be put through. Director General McAdoo has forecasted the expenditure of several hundred millions in equipping streams and canals to cooperate with the overburdened railroad system in handling traffic.

The streams and canals were the first lines of traffic in the development of our country. For slow freight this form of transportation was always efficient and cheap, and can again be made so. The private management of railways deliberately and systematically discouraged and destroyed this traffic. One of the great advantages of the government control lies in the fact that all good means of traffic will be utilized to their full possibilities.

Use of the great rivers of the country, notably the Ohio, Mississippi and Missouri, the Director General declares to be an imperative necessity. These rivers now are carrying only a relatively insignificant proportion of freight. With additional craft they can effect immense relief to the overtaxed railroad lines. The Director General even prefers spending money on the development of waterway transportation rather than on the railroads.

As a war measure this is imperative. It will be no less important as a permanent means of public convenience and utility.

Churchgoing and Matrimony

CITY people are learning what has been known to the way-back country folk from time immemorial—that churchgoing leads to love and matrimony.

The institutional church scheme is proving wonderfully productive of marriages. One church, with its large Sunday school, its gymnasium, athletic clubs, sociables, picnics and its hundred other interests, is averaging about a dozen marriages a month. The big choir of 150 members has been keeping Cupid and the parson on the jump. Fortunately, the law restricting marriages of teachers does not hold in Sunday schools, and several have taken advantage of the privilege.

Human nature is much the same in all grades of life the world over. The bashful young man of the country whose soul is in his gaze across the meeting-house at the girl of his choice in her Sunday best, and who at last generates enough courage to wait for her at the door and ask to see her home, is not different either in instinct or in temperament from the more polished and more bold young man of the big city. Love levels us all.

In the country and the small towns the church is the center of social intercourse; and to thousands of young men and young women who have gone into the cities to work, and have few connections or acquaintances there, the church serves the same social purpose. The young women in city boarding houses who have no opportunity to meet young men of their class, nor any place to receive them, find both in the institutional church.

"The club and social life for the city's young people," says a Brooklyn superintendent, "is most beneficial. While I would not say that it is a necessity for church existence in a large city, I must say that it is very helpful to our work in the church and helpful as well to the young."

In these times of hasty, reckless marrying the church courtship exerts its beneficent influence. The truest and most perfect unions are contracted through the wholesome friendships begun in the churches.

John L. Sullivan Dead

JOHNN L. SULLIVAN, former heavy-weight champion of the world and the most picturesque figure the prize ring ever knew, passed away the other day at his home, Doncelee Ross Farm, at West Abington, Mass. The pugilistic ring never brought fame to any man as to John L. Sullivan. For a period of more than ten years, from the time he defeated Paddy Ryan in 1882 and later the English Mitchell in Paris, becoming the world's champion heavy-weight pugilist, till he was defeated by Jim Corbett in New Orleans in 1892, his personality and methods of boxing dominated sporting circles in this country. He was so popular and so well known that "John L." meant Sullivan. He was born and brought up in Boston. He was large and powerful. He is said to have lifted a piano. Having become the physical champion of the world, he was knocked out by John Barleycorn. He said so himself. He said that he made about a million dollars in the prize ring and spent most of it for whisky. He was a perfect terror, a devil, when drunk. He cleaned out the policemen and the bartenders, and smashed the bottles and mirrors of the saloons at a beautiful rate. Then he would settle generously for the damage done. His friends knew, and he admitted, that it was the effects of rum that disabled him so that Corbett took the championship away from him. But this quick-witted Irish boy, this genial-hearted man, when gray-haired, reformed, asserted the real manhood that was in him and knocked down John Barleycorn and won the long fight. One night, at the end of a long spree, he vowed that he would never take another drink. In the morning he awoke and saw a bottle full of champagne on the table by his bed. Consumed by the fierce alcoholic thirst as he was, he resisted this temptation and renewed his vow. He had made such pledges and broken them before, but this time he resisted the craving which had so often mastered him, and this vow he kept till the day of his death. He became a radical Prohibitionist and went over the country delivering temperance lectures. His last days were full of kindness and charity. In his reform and in his active work for temperance, benevolence and piety he was obedient to this injunction: "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." (1 Tim. 6:12.)

42,000 Patents in Year

INVENTION in this country has reached high-water mark. In one year forty-two thousand separate patents were issued to inventors by the United States. The character of some of the inventions is worthy of note. In the electrical, mechanical, and industrial, the new discoveries have conserved material energy and expense and ministered to the welfare of society.

The inventive genius, the industry and the thrift, as well as character, of the American people are largely responsible for the nation's wealth. The inquisitive instinct which leads the American mind to invention was possessed by the Greeks, and went out into the field of art, letters, philosophy, government and religion. There is this ref-subtle electrical current, in his practical use of it as an instrument of industry, benevolence and piety, he is imitating the Creator, who made and directs it as thus described: "Who hath divided a way for the lightning of thunder, a watercourse for the overflowing of waters, or to cause it to rain upon the earth, where no man is?" (Job. 38: 25, 26.)

Horses and Slippery Pavements

THE people have had a hard time this awfully cold winter. The shortage in coal compelled one of the richest men in America to instal oil stoves in his palatial residence, and caused the children of the poor to cry with cold. The season has been hard on the horses too. Many have slipped and fallen on icy streets and broken their legs and had to be shot to be put out of their misery. Some fell into holes along the lines of subway construction in New York. Much of the suffering of the poor horses has come from the carelessness or cruelty of the drivers or owners. They have piled on the wagon too heavy loads for good roads, much less for those blocked with banks of snow. Through sheer stinginess, they have left on the horses' feet the thin shoes already worn smooth, rather than go to the blacksmith and get them roughshod, and the poor dumb brute, so anxious to pull his load, slips with every foot at every step and then falls down in the harness. To the icy ference to it: "For all the Athenians and strangers which were there spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing." (Acts 17: 21.)

Straw Hats in Winter

THERE are men in certain shops in America who wear straw hats all the year round. They are engaged in electrical work of one kind or another. They not only have their hands protected by gloves, but the straw hat acts as a non-conductor of the fluid and protects the head against danger. The stiff brim and the crown touch the wire and save the head. A workman wearing a felt hat with which a live wire was touched received through it a bolt that killed him, whereas if he had worn a straw hat, it is said the tragedy would have been avoided. The elements of nature—water, fire, electricity—as servants are useful and beneficent; as man's master, they are terribly destructive. In man's mastery of the street is added insufficient feeding in some instances. A stable manager was fined $75 and costs the other day for starving to death four thoroughbred horses which his employer had taken to winter on his farm, one of the horses being Robert Emmet, a trotter valued at $2,500. It is bad enough to mistreat a cat, that may carry disease to the baby, or the dog that might go mad and bite a child; but what if the ingratitude and meanness of a man who would be cruel to his faithful horse that supports him and his family? One of the most blessed institutions of this country is the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which answers the pitiful plea of the beast for mercy, and lays the strong arm of the law on the driver who causes the pain. The good man, without the demands of the law, will be good to his horses, in accordance with this Scripture: "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." (Prov. 12: 10.)

Solved Fuel Problem

WHEN the coal gave out at Lawrenceburg, Ind., the citizens took their axes, went out to the forest, felled big trees, and chopped them into cordwood as a substitute for the fuel ordinarily used. The other day more than 900 physicians, lawyers, preachers, merchants, bankers, artists and citizens generally went out to the banks of the river where three camps had been established and chopped wood all day, and at night 600 cords were stacked on the ground. And the men had as much fun as work. This wood was sawed in shorter lengths for stove wood and delivered to buyers by dealers who had no coal. The professional men and capitalists were charged $6 a cord, the workman $3 a cord, and to the poor who had no money to pay it was freely given for nothing. It was a beautiful thing for the people of Lawrenceburg to adjust themselves so promptly, wisely and generously to the fuel emergency. Instead of shivering and looking for the coal car, they got up and warmed themselves, first with their axes, and then with the wood they cut. When the people got behind an enterprise it is bound to go. The fuel problem in Lawrenceburg was solved as the problem of mason work was solved in building the wall of Jerusalem, by the people taking hold of the job. "So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof, for the people had a mind to work." (Neh. 4: 6.)

NEARLY every-body is born right-handed, and yet two, and some authorities say four, out of every hundred are left-handed. In a test of 2,000 school children it was found that 4½ per cent. of the girls and 5½ per cent. of the boys used the left hand in preference to the right. The popular impression has been that to be born left-handed is a misfortune and to a certain degree a hindrance, to be cured as soon as possible by teaching the children to use the right hand in preference. This is a mistake. Nature made no slip at all. She intended to make the person left-handed by making the right lobe of the brain larger, throwing the emphasis on the muscles of the left arm. Hence the time and labor in curing the person of left-handedness is lost, and makes only a moderately efficient right hand at the cost of the efficiency of the left. The left-handed person would have no difficulty in using the right for shaking hands, or in taking food from the tray of the waiter brought to the left side of the diner at the table, or in learning to write with the right hand, though it would seem better for the pen to be used in the left hand, where the instinct to do so is strong, rather than make a botch of it with the right hand. In most of the callings of life there will be the greatest efficiency if the left-handed person will do what Providence seems to have intended—give the preference to the left hand. Not only in the use of the organs of the body does Providence make the path of preference plain, but also in the selection of a calling in life—the profession, business or trade that will incur the least resistance, and in which the individual will have the largest measure of usefulness and happiness possible. If any boy ever played snow ball with a left-handed school-fellow called a "southpaw," he knew that he would get it in the face, breast or legs, as the thrower intended. Or if the test were made as to who could knock a tin can off the top of a stick a certain number of yards away, with a stone, it would be seen that the left-handed boy would be far in the lead; thus illustrating the fact stated in the Bible that it takes a left-handed man to hit a mark with a stone. Here it is: "Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed; every one could sling stones at a hair breadth and not miss." (Judges 20: 16.)

The Man Who Forgot

TEXT—Gen. 46: 23. "Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgot him."

THESE verses are from the heart of the incomparable story of Joseph. They bear upon a singular episode of that famous character's life, and they paint the picture of a man who forgot. Young Joseph was cast into prison on a false charge, but even in prison it was impossible to subdue him. He was a man of influence among the other prisoners, and the keeper committed their welfare into Joseph's hands. It came to pass that the king's chief butler and chief baker were also cast into prison and that they had each a peculiar dream which sore perplexed them. Seeing their countenances troubled Joseph asked the reason. They told him of their dreams and Joseph gave them the interpretations. He told the chief butler that his dream signified his restoration to Pharaoh's favor; and the chief baker that his dream foreshadowed the loss of his life.

Of the chief butler Joseph made a very natural and reasonable request. He asked that when the butler regained his liberty and his office that he remember him and make mention of his case to the king that he might be released from an unjust imprisonment. In due season the chief butler was restored to his high position; but alas! he forgot Joseph, who remained a prisoner two years longer. Then Pharaoh dreamed a dream that greatly distressed him. He slept and dreamed again, a second dream that added to the perplexity occasioned by the first. The king's wise men and soothsayers were assembled but none could interpret the dream. At this critical juncture the chief butler presented himself before the king, saying, "I do remember my faults this day." Then he recounted to Pharaoh Joseph's interpretation of his dream and that of the chief baker. Straightway the king sent for Joseph, who made himself ready, appeared before Pharaoh, heard his dream and interpreted it fully. Furthermore, he advised the king wisely as to his future policy with regard to the fulfillment of certain events forecasted by his interpretation. From that very hour high honor and position were conferred upon Joseph. He was made second to the king himself in authority, and his fame spread throughout the land.

IT is not Joseph, however, who engages our thoughts in this study; but instead the strange conduct of the man whom he had befriended. How account for such conduct? Why did the butler forget Joseph? Was it because his tasks had so accumulated that all his time was taken in gaining that which was lost while he was a prisoner? Is it possible to excuse him on the grounds that Joseph was crowded entirely out of his mind because of manifold and exacting duties? Hardly! One cannot conceive of any man under any circumstances so placed as to permit even onerous and continuous round of duties to crowd out the recognition of such a kindness as Joseph did the chief butler.

Did the butler ignore Joseph because of any fear he may have had of the king? Was he fearful that by calling attention to Joseph's case he would jeopardize his own position or possibly his life? That is possible. Did the chief butler fail Joseph because he disliked to be put under obligation to him and therefore repudiated the obligation when freedom was secured? Perhaps. Or still again, was the chief butler one such who believed himself to be a superior being, accepted every favor as a matter of course, and dismissed straightway any sense of obligation from his mind? That may have been the case.

These are interesting questions, although we cannot answer them. We do not know precisely why the butler forgot Joseph, but we may be sure that it was not because of a poor memory. A man may forget to mail a letter for his wife, to return a book or umbrella, and charge the same to poor memory; but when a man forgets a kindness done him, a faulty memory is not the reason, be sure of that! The chief butler's sin was thoughtlessness, and that is the commonest sin in all the world.

WHAT a family of forgetters the human race is! How numerous are the thoughtless, the negligent, and the careless! "I didn't think." "I forgot." "I was thoughtless." Are not these confessions of not only thousands but literally millions of mortals? The sin of thoughtlessness is a manifest weakness of humanity. How prone we are to forget one another! We make numerous promises that we never fulfill. We announce plans that we never carry out. How often we forget those nearest and dearest of earth! Friends separate and vow to keep up a regular correspondence. For a while letters are interchanged each week, then a month intervenes, then they come and go intermittently, then rarely, and finally cease altogether. Not infrequently I meet a mother or father who informs me that somewhere out in the wide world, just where they know not, they have a son from whom they have not heard for years. Once in a great while it is a daughter, and alas! far away, who has forgotten the old home. Forgotten! What a pathetic word! And akin to it is that other word equally sad—"forsaken!"

How we forget God! As children we remembered him. He seemed nearby then. We saw him in the beauty of the spring morning. We traced his countenance in the clouds. We beheld him in the glory of a starlit winter night. We heard him in the wind of the treetops and we listened to his melody in the weird, wild note of the water fowls. We heard him in the music of the surf beating on the rocky shores. We sensed his presence when mother sang her lullaby or father with patriarchal grace read from the Holy Book or lifted his voice in prayer.

ALAS, how many people forget God! There are hundreds in our own city today who have forgotten the heavenly Father. They remember sport; they remember business; they remember society; but they forget God. They know the latest play, but they do not know God. They never pray; they never read the Scriptures; they never read a religious book; they never attend a service in the house of God unless it be a funeral of friend or neighbor. So far as they are concerned God is as though he were not. They are strangers to the still, sad music of humanity, a note which none hear until they listen to God.

How we forget Jesus Christ our Saviour! We remember the thrilling story of Columbus discovering America. We forget the wondrous narrative of Jesus' rediscovery of God. We remember Alexander who wept for more worlds to destroy. We forget Jesus who shed tears because Jerusalem refused to be saved. We remember Washington at Valley Forge. We forget Jesus in Gethsemane. We remember Mad Anthony Wayne storming the heights at Stony Point. We forget Jesus with his calm countenance set like flint toward Jerusalem.

HOW prone we are to forget the three years of Jesus' public ministry, his matchless teaching, his habits of constant communion with the Father, his love for little children, his affection for the outcast, his complete freedom from artificial standards, his sympathy with the common people, the stroke upon stroke which fell so tragically the last few days of his earthly career, his betrayal by Judas, his denial by Peter, his makeshift trial, the cruel blows in his face, the mockery and spitting upon him, the scourging, the sorrowful way to Calvary, the spikes driven through his hands and feet to the timbers of the cross, the lifting of him up to hang between two robbers, the same exposure and degradation, the three hours of darkness, the great heart-breaking cry—"My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—the descent from the cross, the burial, the sealing of the tomb, the women weeping at the sepulcher; then lo! the young man in white, the empty tomb, and the Christ victorious over the grave and regnant evermore. How prone we are to forget the Life of lives, the Wonder of wonders!

Oh, we are a family of forgetters! We belong to the great company of the thoughtless, and the sin of thoughtlessness is the most frequent occurrence in all the world. "Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgot him." The chief butler and you and I have much in common.

THERE came a day of awakening for the chief butler. For two years he restrained himself and stilled the voice of conscience. For various reasons he forgot Joseph. Then came his sovereign's suffering. No one could interpret this strange dream. O, if Joseph were only known to the monarch! The windows of the palace were darkened. Pharaoh had taken to his bed. The voices of music were brought low. The servants tiptoed through the hallways. The atmosphere was heavy with gloom. Oh, if some one could only interpret the king's dream. The soothsayers and astrologers had failed.

Then, thank God! the chief butler came to himself. He presented himself before the king, saying, "I do remember my faults this day." Then he told the story of Joseph in prison. From that time on I fancy the chief butler could sleep better at night. From that time on a new power came into his life. He had confessed his sin of thoughtlessness and made amends to the best of his ability. He spoke out; he made a plea for Joseph. Joseph was rewarded. Pharaoh was pleased. For the chief butler the long night rolled away and daybreak was everywhere.

If the sin of thoughtlessness be the most common in the world, thank God the hour of awakening is not infrequent and many are the means utilized to make us think. Sometimes bereavement with its sombreness and its heart pangs tends to make us thoughtful. The mystery of death sometimes banishes, as day the night, the careless and thoughtless and indifferent attitude of men and women. Sometimes the veriest trifle—a snatch of song unheard for many years, the fragrance of a flower, the touch of a child's hand, the sound of a voice, the note of a bird. Sometimes an apparent incident strangely stirs us up by way of remembrance, and like the chief butler we confess, "This day I remember my faults."

IN no realm of life is the tendency of thoughtlessness so relentless and strong as in the spiritual. Thus the Bible from beginning to end, in history, in law, in prayers, in parables, in prophecy, in proverb, line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, strives to put us in remembrance of our duty to God and man. The "remember texts" of the Bible are many and exceedingly eloquent. In the bold and brilliant parable of Lazarus and the rich man there flashed out like forked lightning the awful words of Abraham to one whose sin was that of thoughtlessness, "Son, remember!" In a solemn passage Jesus uses an allusion dark with tragedy, "Remember Lot's wife." Writing from prison, and perhaps chained to a soldier while he dictated a letter, St. Paul writes to the Colossians, "Remember my bonds." To Timothy he writes, "Remember Jesus Christ." Especially significant is Peter's reference in his second Epistle to the need of reminding his hearers lest the sin of thoughtlessness be their undoing. Thus he writes, "And I think right as long as I am in this tabernacle to stir you up by putting you in remembrance."

THE church is God's great means of putting us in remembrance of our duty to him and to one another. Consider its mighty memorial institutions and its monuments of grace. Look at its ordinances:—baptism, a memorial of the death, and burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ; a symbol of the believer's death to sin and resurrection to a new life in Jesus. The Lord's Supper, instituted by Christ for his disciples. Of this institution he said, "This do in remembrance of me." The loaf, emblematic of Jesus' body; the fruit of the vine, emblematic of his life blood; the one marred for us, the other shed that we might live. Moreover, this memorial supper is a reminder of our identity with Christ's body and the spiritual food we may feed our souls upon daily. The Lord's Day itself is an ever-recurring reminder of Christ, his triumph over the grave, his victory over sin. Upon all sides God has beset us, behind and before with reminders of his goodness and love. How can we be thoughtless, heedless, and indifferent, save at the peril of our immortal souls? It becomes us every one to say with the chief butler, "This day do I remember my faults."

Winter Hopes

By MARY DAVIS

I NEVER thought of telling Him
The cares that blurred my bit of sky;
He seemed too great and far away
To heed such simple folks as I.

Till once I wandered in the woods,
When winter ruled our northern land,
And found the buds of next year's spring
Protected by a sheltering hand.

God's love lay heavy on the woods;
It rested on the things asleep.
It blessed the squirrel and his store,
It touched the warm wool of the sheep.

A tiny bird with merry chirp,
Settled upon the sedges dry,
And munched the seeds placed there for him,
By Him who hears the sparrow's cry.

And there within the winter woods,
While winter ruled our northern land,
The secret of God's love grew bright;
I groped and touched my Father's hand.

The Power of Darkness

SUNDAY, March 3. Col. 1:13. "He hath delivered us from the power of darkness." I think that one of the great perils of the present time is in this paralyzing power of darkness. The world is full of sorrows. Millions are walking in the gloomy shadow of death, or in the almost equally oppressive gloom of the fear of death. The terrible gusts of our day are blowing out many friendly lights!

How, then, shall it be with the darkness? Shall it be a hostile darkness which induces spiritual paralysis, or shall it be a strangely pervaded darkness which is the servant of a sovereign hope and peace?

There is here a great call for the saving ministries of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Never was the believer in Christ more privileged with opportunities of service. It is our ministry, in Christ Jesus, "to give light to them that sit in darkness." We are called to go here and there as lamplighters on dark roads.

"Let the redeemed of the Lord say so!" We are to retell the old story of redeeming love and grace. We are to tell it with quiet confidence as those who know and believe it. And it is amazing what one can do, who has the assurance of faith, in steady doubt and trembling hearts! It is amazing what one confident soul can do among a whole shipful of panic-stricken folk when he quietly says, "Sirs, be of good cheer; I believe God!"

The watchman on the mountain, with his good news of breaking day, gives heart to everybody in the darkened vale. "In thy light have we seen light."

My God and Your Need

MONDAY, March 4. Phil. 4:19. "My God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus." What are our deepest needs? We need strength and constancy; inward reinforcement and comfort; peace and poise; knowledge and love; hope and joy. We need forgiveness. Ah, how much we need forgiveness! We all need it, and the holiest among us are the most conscious of their need. We need new motives to high endeavor. Our human nature, like a cheap cloak, quickly runs down. But is not all our need expressed when we say we need God? Our lives are poor without God, whatever else they may be supplied with. Deprived of all things else but God, a life may be infinitely rich.

A soldier had fallen in No Man's Land and lay helpless all through the night. At first he was hopeless as well as helpless. Then God spoke to him, came into his heart, became at once the greatest and the most intimate fact of his life. Wounded and bleeding, death hovering near, he felt richer and was happier than he had ever been before. God was supplying all his need, for God stooped low to take that life into friendship with Himself.

Christ is the medium through whom God ministers to our needs. If God is like the sun in the sky, Christ is like the sunshine. He warms our hearts, heals our diseases, enlightens our minds, redeems our lives from destruction. The Word made flesh to dwell among us may also dwell within us.

Troubles and Triumphs

TUESDAY, March 5. II Cor. 4:7, 8, 9. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us. We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." How truly these words describe the experiences of a Christian life! The soul that has received the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ has a treasure. The great revelation which has come to it of its present state under grace and its future state in glory begets a profound feeling of happiness. The Christian may become lifted up with pride because of the wonderful favor that God has bestowed on him. He may expect that all men should recognize his exalted position. His life ought to be a most pleasant one.

Instead he finds that his rest is often disturbed. Doubts assail his certainties; fears dash his hopes; his rejoicings are accompanied by tremblings. Like the disciples with their Master on that memorable voyage across the Galilean Sea he started out with the sun shining brightly and the sea calm, and suddenly he is caught in a squall, and the waves are buffeting his ship on every side.

He labors for a righteous cause in which all men should be on his side and support him. Instead, he is opposed, and put upon the defensive. His every success costs him a great effort, his victories are achieved after fierce struggles, and the pleasures which they ought to bring him are mixed with many a painful reminiscence. All this happens to remind the Christian that he is bearing his heavenly treasures in earthen vessels. He is still in the flesh, subject to the common frailties of the human nature. His pilgrimage leads through a hostile country, for the world because of its carnal mind is at enmity with the Christian's Lord. Satan, whose dominion over the Christian has indeed been broken, is not willing to abandon his old claims and tempts the Christian again to sin. If the Christian is not overcome by his enemies—and he is not—he cannot ascribe his victories to himself but only to the power of God, who upholds him under all difficulties.

The Eternal Habitation

WEDNESDAY, March 6. II Cor. 5:1. "We have a building of God, eternal in the heavens." The animal and the savage, who are low down in the grade of being, do not mourn long for the dead. "Out of sight, out of mind." As manhood has risen in the scale of being his aspirations and belief in a future life have enlarged. Now, the loss of friends means reunion beyond. The memory of the departed grows brighter as one nears the undiscovered country. We find that we belong to two worlds, the physical and the spiritual, and that we must enter the higher to complete the happiness and usefulness of our being. Christianity means the union of the present and the future—they are really like our Lord's seamless robe, one throughout. Eternity is here in our hearts as well as among the redeemed.

The spray of the Jordan, the baptism of death, makes no change in the purity of the spirit, any more than the crossing of a bridge makes transformation of the passenger. One change there will be in our social surroundings—the wicked will be separated from the good like the tares from the wheat. Man cannot succeed in his fight against God. He cannot even harm or interfere with nature and her laws. Can he bind the sweet influence of the Pleiades or loose the bands of Orion, or stop the flow of the sunlight, or chain the power of gravitation, or control the winds and the seas? Never! Man is a pigmy before the power of the Highest.

Who shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord? No human power or creature or devil or things to come will ever move a single child of God a hair's breadth from His bosom.

Hearing God's Voice

THURSDAY, March 7. Heb. 3:7, 8. "Today, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts." Do we speak of realities when we speak of hearing God's voice? Let us confess we are dealing in symbols. Only the young child or the savage imagines he hears God's voice in the thunder and in the noise of mighty cataracts or rushing winds. And yet, though we think poetically, we think truly when we speak of hearing God's voice. We think truly when we speak of hearing the voice of duty. Is not duty the master of every ethical human being? Do we not hear love's sweet, compelling voice? Why then may we not hear God's voice? We do. He speaks to us through history, through the moral law, through the Scriptures, and supremely through Jesus Christ.

Humboldt had an Arab guide whose eyesight was so keen that he saw with the unaided vision the moons of Jupiter. The eye can be trained. So can the ear. The trained ear of a naturalist hears voices that the rest of us are deaf to. So does the trained ear of the musician. The trained ear of the life-saver in the surf at Atlantic City distinguishes among a thousand merry voices the one cry for help, the call of distress. Some people can hear the voice of God where others think there is utter silence. It is the part of wisdom to train the spirit to recognize the voice of God when He speaks. For God speaks, not only through nature, the moral law, the Bible, and Jesus Christ, but through the providences of our lives. He speaks through the crises of our lives, through single episodes which assume the character of crises. A youth sat in a Sunday service, and during the sermon was impressed that this was the time of all times for him to bring his hitherto indefinite thinking about religion to a definite point. It came to him as he listened, "This is the day of my visitation; it is now or never." He yielded his will to the Supreme Will and afterward he was heard to say again and again, "I am glad I settled it when I did."

The Willing Mind

FRIDAY, March 8. II Cor. 8:12. "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not." To a person that is willing and eager to serve with others in a common cause the perception of his inability is distressing. He is forced to remain inactive at a time when much depends upon his being active. A great opportunity for doing good is before him but he cannot meet it. He feels like a prisoner of war who has come out of the battle unscathed and then must surrender, while he sees his comrades still fighting. The situation becomes aggravated when a person's inability to serve is misinterpreted. We cannot actually show other people the eagerness, the burning desire to serve, to help, to be active, that is in our hearts and is fairly consuming us; we can only say that we are willing.

How comforting, then, is a text like this to a willing worker! God, who sees what no man can see, is willing to accept the good inclination in the place of a good action. He prizes a fervent prayer in behalf of some noble enterprise as highly as a thousand dollar gift. And so should we. The thing which is of primary importance in any undertaking is really the willing mind, the cordial interest, the enthusiastic determination to help. That must come first, and then come the busy hand and the open purse. We should sympathize sincerely with all who cannot do what they would like to do. Even a poor man's interest in a noble cause is a valuable asset in a campaign. Such people feel discouraged enough by themselves and we should not discourage them still more by open or veiled contempt. It goes without saying, however, that this text applies only to such as are really willing to work, but cannot. It does not protect those who shield their unwillingness by pretending that they lack the capacity and means for service. Let them bear in mind that they must make their assertions not only before men but before the all-knowing God.

Transfiguration

SATURDAY, March 9. Mark 9:2. "And he was transfigured before them." The Transfiguration was Raphael's last and greatest work of art. There is a vast contrast between the upper portion of the picture, representing the glory of Christ and of the Apostles, and the lower portion, where an evil spirit is in possession of a child, whom the disciples had failed to cast out. Nine Apostles are on one side and the afflicted family on the other. Heaven and earth appear to have come together more completely than in any other scene in Christ's life.

The Transfiguration was evidently for the purpose of strengthening Christ for the decease which he was soon to accomplish on Calvary. Moses and Elias, representing the law and the prophets, were present to single out the Master as the Founder of a new dispensation. The scene was also no doubt for the purpose of impressing Peter, James and John with the majesty of Christ's divinity. That wonderful hour never faded from their vision in all their future labors for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom.

The illumination of the glorious mount was not chiefly for the joy and delight of the earthly and heavenly company, but to give them strength for the victories which they were to win in the valley.

They were not to sing and shout, "It is good to be here," but to use the power bestowed, like that of the Pentecost, for the uplifting of the fallen and the comfort of the troubled. Christ is the central Personage of both scenes. He is the fulfilment of the law and the prophets, the one who can cast out evil spirits and rescue a race from sin and death.

Is not one meaning of this event that all believers may become like Christ in transfiguration beauty, when we reign with him in his glory? E. W. C.

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

THE four ministers sat on the platform, after the people had gone, as if by common consent agreeing to confer together over the event that had marked the day.

Howard asked them to come into the church, and by a united impulse they knelt in the little Sunday school room, where Howard led in a prayer that seemed to break down all formality and open up the whole avenue of a real brotherhood. The others followed, and when they rose from their knees the tears on their faces spoke, more eloquently than any words, of the real emotion of their hearts.

"Brothers," Howard said as they came out of the church upon the platform, "it's been a wonderful evening. No one can tell what will come of it. But I believe if we go along quietly and normally, doing our regular work, we are going to see some remarkable things in Red Hill and the country."

"How about getting an evangelist to come in and start regular revival services?" said Brother Noyes. "Although it isn't the time of year for it."

Howard looked at him curiously.

"Looks to me," he said gently but in his abrupt manner, "as if we had a pretty good evangelist now. The Holy Spirit has started a revival here. Why not let him continue it? Can we improve on it by getting some man to come in?"

Brother Noyes looked uneasily at his younger brother, then a rare smile crossed his face.

"The whole thing is so new that I spoke in terms of my old habits. But there must be some man direction of this God-begun movement. What is to guide us in this matter? What is our duty?"

"I don't see that we have got to map out any set plan. Let us go about our regular work tomorrow, and in every wise way keep our spirits open. This event is so plainly from God that it cannot fall to the ground. The people are repentant. We have claimed the promises here tonight. We are united in our one purpose to help bring into the community the life of the Master. If this thing is of God, as it clearly seems to be, I am convinced we shall be led to do our part in the wisest ways."

Howard spoke with a positive note that none of the other men could command, and without jealousy or argument they let him take the lead, feeling instinctively that something in him fitted him for such leadership.

So they parted for the night, none of them, however, not even Howard, understanding that event, or the ultimate effect it was destined to have on the future of Red Hill.

Monday morning around the breakfast tables of Red Hill the talk was usually the same worn-out commonplace—the weather, the show, the crops, the local politics or the local gossip. This Monday it centered about the meetings of the day before at the Congregational church and in many a home the Bible was read and prayer offered and thanks given at the table where such recognition of a Divine Being in man's affairs had not been made within the memory of the household.

AT the parsonage breakfast, Roy Lennox and his wife were tremendously interested in Howard's account of the meeting held with the other ministers, and expressed the greatest faith in the regenerating processes evidently begun.

Then the talk drifted quite naturally to Inez and her future.

"I'll have to start for New York soon, Howard," Roy had said. "There is a possibility that the Seminary will put me to work in the Riverside Settlement. And Kate is anxious to see how the girl will respond to her invitation to go with us. What do you think she will do?"

"I believe she will go," Rose said eagerly. "You and Miss Burton talk it over and then go and see Inez."

So that afternoon, after a long talk with Miss Burton, Mrs. Lennox and she went to see Inez, whose father had excused her from work at the shop on account of her fainting at the close of the service.

They found Inez pale but interesting-looking and rather fluttered by the call of Mrs. Lennox, with no hint in her own mind as to its meaning. She was totally unprepared for the question Mrs. Lennox finally put to her, after Miss Burton had led up to the reason for the call, telling her of Mrs. Lennox's interest in her welfare and her soon return to New York.

"How would you like to come to New York with Mr. Lennox and me? Somehow, from the first time I saw you, I seemed to feel as if you belonged to a city, and at the same time," Mrs. Lennox went on, with a leaning toward Inez that touched the girl's imagination and stirred her affection, "at the same time, it seemed to me that if you came to a big city you ought to have a big sister to look after you. I wonder if you would be willing to let me 'Big Sister' you for a little while in New York?"

INEZ sat up on the couch where her visitors had found her, and her eyes glowed. Her fingers closed around a motion picture magazine she had been reading and she looked first at Miss Burton and then at Mrs. Lennox.

"In my dreams I'm always walking the streets of big cities," she murmured, repeating what she had said once to Agnes Burton. "But I don't know that my father could spare me from the shop. And what could I do? How could I?"—she thought of saying "afford it"—and then stopped, eyeing Mrs. Lennox with a childlike look that betrayed at once her ignorance of the big world and her eagerness to see it.

Mrs. Lennox seemed to anticipate her thoughts.

"Of course, Mr. Lennox and I will want you to come into our home and be our guest. But you would not want to be idle or just a sightseer all the time. You could be learning something—finding out what you could best do, and making the most of yourself." Mrs. Lennox spoke with a charming frankness that Inez liked, but she still hesitated, glancing under her half-closed eyes at Miss Burton.

"You talk with Miss Burton about it," said Mrs. Lennox. "I will let you be alone. I believe it will be better so. But I shall be greatly disappointed if you do not say yes."

She took Inez's hand as she rose to go, and the girl felt drawn to her, she was so much in earnest, and so genuine.

But as soon as she was alone with her teacher she turned swiftly and with an impetuous gesture.

"So this is your scheme to get rid of me. I believe you want Mr. Chase all to yourself!"

Ah! Inez! How swift is love's understanding of love! You saw in the school teacher's whole attitude that Sunday when she cleared the minister's reputation—you saw what not even gossip-loving Red Hill saw—the teacher's heart.

"Inez!" was all she could say; but Inez caught at her hand.

"Forgive me! I am so unhappy! But I will go away. It is like a story in a book, happening to me! But I don't know what father will say!"

She was excited over the possibility of a dream about to come true, but now that it was in a way to be realized she began to be fearful of the unknown.

Miss Burton talked with her about it all, explaining to her what it would mean to be with people like the Lennoxes. And before she went away Inez was eager, if her father would consent, to go to New York and start new experiences.

"Do you suppose they would be willing to let me study for the stage?" was one question out of many that Inez put to Miss Burton.

"I don't know, Inez. But I know perfectly well they will not get in the way of your doing anything that will help to make a real useful woman of you. Promise me you will not do anything to harm God's wish for you, Inez."

"I promise," the girl said, crying a little, "if I only can find out what he does wish. Some one must know. I don't seem to myself."

SHE brushed the tears away and smiled at her teacher as she rose.

"And promise me you will send me an invitation to the wedding soon." She said it with an air half serious, half jesting. "And, oh, yes, there is one other thing. I want you to tell Mr. Chase something. I feel ashamed to tell. And I may not have any opportunity if I go to New York soon. Promise me you will."

"Why, of course I will, if—"

"It's perfectly proper. Perfectly," said Inez, with an air that made Miss Burton laugh. "Tell him that the lilacs on the pulpit the first Sunday he preached were put there by me."

"You put them there!" Miss Burton turned rosy red.

"Yes. I did it. Was it very wicked? But I think he's been guessing about them ever since! It doesn't seem fair to leave him guessing."

And poor Inez fell back on her couch crumpling the motion picture magazine into a shapeless wad as she cried and laughed together, her head buried in a cushion and Miss Burton standing over her, in despair over her impossible moods commingled of childishness and grown-up womanhood.

Mrs. Lennox called that evening at the Burtons to find out what Inez's decision was, and was delighted with Miss Burton's report. She went with her the next day to see Mr. Clark, and after a long and doubtful talk with him secured his consent to his daughter's going.

So Inez, in a fever of eagerness to go and misgiving about leaving, began her simple preparations. There was a pressure of work in the office that she told Mr. Lennox she must help her father meet, which might mean several weeks, but Roy Lennox was getting greatly interested in the new developments following the Sunday night meeting, and Howard had any number of plans for using him in a county survey, so Mrs. Lennox arranged to give Inez time to prepare for her new life, pleased at the girl's evident sense of responsibility toward her father and counting the time well spent in acquainting herself with Inez and also helping Rose and her brother in the new program of church and parish life that the revival began to open up to them.

FOR as the first few days succeeded one another following that Sunday when Red Hill caught its first real vision of a Divine Presence, the normal naturalness of the whole thing gradually crept upon the hearts and minds of the ministers and the people.

By a general agreement all the churches united in one mid-week service going from one church to another. These meetings, which were well attended, as time went on became the center of very important decisions and ultimately the starting place for Red Hill's community life; but there was no unusual or superficial or hysterical excitement, no outward signs of miraculous intervention. Elder Noyes confessed to a feeling of disappointment.

"I supposed we were going to have a great revival after that clear manifestation. If we had brought Evangelist Cohman here right off I believe we could have worked up a great revival that would have shaken Red Hill. We made a mistake not to call him."

Howard looked at Elder Noyes earnestly.

"What do you call what we are having now? Postmaster Long has doubled his church subscription. Judge Roland has joined the church. Rod Cartwright has paid his grocery bill. Angus McCall has settled his feud with Roderick Loder. The farmers are beginning to come to the mid-week meeting. Sister Jane Snowden apologized to Sister Whitehall in front of the post-office for giving her short weight on her butter last spring. What more could you ask? If we are not having a revival, what is it?"

HOWARD'S grin was irresistible. Elder Noyes succumbed to it. But he still felt like entering a protest at the lack of great meetings and some religious excitement. Howard called his attention to a number of other clear signs of the presence of the divine power in the town.

"Have you noticed how interested the people are getting in real religion? Stop anywhere on a corner Saturday and listen to the talk. What are the people talking about? The war? The crops? Politics? The high cost of living? The boom in wheat? Not a bit. They are discussing the need of a better schoolhouse, the character of the show, the need of a library and some place for the boys at night; they are talking about the Bible, and going over your sermon or Brother Gray's or mine. Have you noticed what the people are beginning to read? Golf's bookstore sold all their Bibles last week. And I started a subscription list for a leading religious weekly a few days ago and got nearly every family in my church to take it. They all take either the Topeka or Kansas City dailies now, but no religious papers. All these things point to a revival, Brother Noyes. Almost without knowing it, we have a revival on our hands."

Elder Noyes shook his head a little doubtfully. It was not the kind of a revival he was used to, and yet he could not refuse to acknowledge the fruits of the Spirit.

"And there's another proof that we're in the midst of a revival," Howard continued as he walked along with Brother Noyes, coming out of the post-office; and as he talked he held Brother Noyes by the arm. "The churches are getting brotherly. Why, I feel quite chummy with you, and the first time I met you I didn't know just what to say." Brother Noyes turned his head to look at his young brother and a tear dropped over his cheek. Howard did not appear to notice it, but went on: "And the greatest sign to my mind of the present of a great power in Red Hill is the gathering sentiment for a closer community life. Did you notice that last week when we had for our subject, 'What can each one of us do to help make Red Hill a better town?' what a crowd we had, and what interest they all took and what answers they gave? Why, Brother Noyes, if the people of this town and county once begin to ask that question in earnest we will have the biggest revival on our hands we ever had."

Howard's enthusiasm was contagious. It swept up over Elder Noyes like a freshet. He could not withstand it. And when he parted with Howard at Deacon Burton's store, he was muttering to himself: "I am beginning to think a lot of him. Just the age my boy would have been if he'd lived. God help me!" Brother Noyes went on to his little home, musing over that tragedy few knew about. To Red Hill he was an elderly, somewhat pompous, not specially interesting man. But a long stretch of self-denying years in the ministry in small churches with meager salary had put its devastating hand on Brother Noyes, brave old soldier of the Cross, carrying his burdens silently and quietly through the dusty years. And Howard was creeping into those dry places of his heart. It was a way he had, Howard Chase, Red Hill, Kansas. Ah, what miracles love can work between men! It is, and always will be, the great miracle worker of the ages.

COMING out of Deacon Burton's store that day Howard met at the door Mrs. Burton and Agnes. They had no errand at the store, but stopped to get the evening paper which was left at the store. The Deacon generally brought it out home with him.

They were going back to the house, and Howard walked along, discussing the events of the midweek meeting of the day before and finally a mention of Inez by Howard led Miss Burton to ask:

"By the way, when are your friends planning to leave for New York?"

"Pretty soon, I think. But I could put my chum to work on the county survey. I don't want him to go."

They had reached Deacon Burton's house, and Mrs. Burton asked Howard to come in. He accepted, with a slight hesitation that Agnes Burton noted, but Howard's action was so indefinite in its meaning that the school teacher did not dwell on it.

Mrs. Burton sat down for a few minutes with her daughter and the minister, talking over church matters; then, without anything more than a few words about getting supper, she went out of the room. Blessed be the tact, or any other word you wish to use, of thoughtful mothers.

"Miss Burton," Howard said quickly, "this is almost the first time I have had to thank you personally for your action on that Sunday—"

"You are not going to thank me for that—"

"If I don't, you know without my saying anything that I will never forget what it means to me."

"I am sure—" she began, and paused because he was gazing at her so earnestly—"I am sure—it was—"

HOWARD sat there silently, seeming to be abstracted even in her presence, caught in one of his moods of retirement that were characteristic of him, so far removed from rudeness that Agnes Burton was not offended, only more deeply interested in him; and she waited quietly for him to resume his usual clear, wide-awake attitude toward life; and she laughed when he suddenly exclaimed: "Oh! I beg pardon, Miss Burton! But you were saying—"

"I don't remember, it's been so long since I said it."

"I wonder if you know where I was all that time. I was thinking—"

"Not of what I said, I am sure," said the school teacher, laughing again.

"Yes, I was," he replied, but in such an impersonal manner that his answer meant nothing.

There was rather an awkward pause, and she finally broke it by saying:

"Inez wished me to tell you something for her, and I promised. She seemed to think you ought to know. Do you remember seeing some flowers on your pulpit the first Sunday you preached in Red Hill?"

"Yes. They were so prominent I couldn't help seeing them."

"Inez wanted me to tell you that she put them there."

"They were very nice flowers," Howard said gravely. Something in his voice and manner set Miss Burton off in a laugh so catching that Howard, after a slow grin, followed.

"Poor Inez! But she will begin a new existence with the Lennoxes. I believe there is a good future for her."

"She will see New York at its very best with them," Howard eagerly assented. "If she has any good future, they will help her to find it."

Agnes Burton asked a few questions about Howard's chum, which he gladly answered, and in answering unconsciously let in the light on some of his own seminary life.

As he rose to go she said, unexpectedly, a slight color betraying her personal anxiety:

"Mr. Chase, are you well? It seems to me you don't look—you look tired."

"Well, to tell the truth, I am tired. I don't just know how to account for it. Last few days I have not been at my best. Guess I need more exercise."

She looked at him apprehensively as he walked toward the door. He lacked that characteristic swiftness and leopard-like swaying gait that people were getting used to.

"You are working too hard," she said softly, as if anticipating some trouble. "You do three men's work. You will break down."

"Oh, I think not; I never broke down yet. Thank you for telling me about Inez and those flowers," he said awkwardly. And with an abrupt goodbye he went away.

THAT evening after supper, he said to his sister, "Rose, I'm going over to see Jake Seymour. I haven't heard from there for two or three days. I won't be out long."

When he knocked at Seymour's modest house across the Santa Fe tracks the Agent opened the door, and, seeing Chase, he stepped outside and closed the door.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Chase, but Jake's got typhoid. Doc Vaughn took his blood test today, and found the germs. He's been comin' down with it now for several days. We thought it was his accident, you know. But Doc is mad. He says Red Hill folks are too stingy to fix up the water works, and the milk gets no decent test, and he says, Doc does, that it's enough to make a cow kick over its own pail to see how quick some folks are to die early so's to save the expense of a long obituary on their tombstones."

"Are there any other cases in town?" Howard asked when the Agent paused.

"I heard Mrs. Wilson's little girl had it, and two or three other kids."

"No! Why, it's murder!"

"That's what Doc says. And there's no way to get the Grand Jury to convict. I thought I better tell you about Jake before you went in."

Howard followed the Agent in and spoke a cheerful word to big Seymour. He was too sick to do much more than murmur a word of thanks for Howard's interest in him, and Howard came away after putting his hand on Seymour's big fist and saying cheerfully:

"The Lord bless you, brother. You've got a lot to live for yet. Your show isn't half over. Keep up a good heart!"

When he reached home Rose was in the kitchen. He went into his study and sat down at his desk and started to work on his sermon.

Fifteen minutes later, Rose, passing by the open door, looking in, was startled to see him, not at his desk, but lying on a couch by the bookcase.

IT was such an unusual habit for him that she came in and went up to the couch, and found him asleep.

She put her hand on his head gently, but the movement roused him, and he opened his eyes.

"Howard! What is the matter?"

"I don't know. I seem to be tired. Too much excitement in Red Hill. Not quiet and soothing like New York."

He grinned, and sat up slowly, looking at Rose as if seeking an answer to a question that trembled on his lip.

"You have never been tired in all your life," she said, with a feeling of terror.

"No. Time to begin. But I am tired." He lay down again. "I'll be all right by Sunday. I've been worrying some. Deacon Allen got after me again today. He says he is going to call a meeting of the deacons and trustees and have the church take action on several matters, especially my use of an unauthorized version of the Bible. Deacon Allen was born three hundred years too late. He ought to have been a member of the state church in Queen Elizabeth's time. He could have had no end of fun persecuting pilgrims and helping to fill up the Mayflower and starting America off all right."

His voice trailed off into a whisper, as he fell back into a doze again.

Rose went out and ran across the street to Dr. Vaughn's. He was not there. Up at the Wilson's, his wife thought. Rose ran up there, found him, and got his promise to come right over to the parsonage.

Two days later all Red Hill, including the country, knew that Howard Chase, the new minister, had come down with typhoid, and within the week that followed they knew that in the little room off the sitting-room a great fight was going on over the strong athletic body for its final possession by the forces called Death and Life.

And Red Hill felt the event like a personal conviction. The town council met and condemned its own cowardice and selfishness in not taking steps to guard its own health. And as the days passed, and Life retreated before Death in that little room, Red Hill fell on its knees and prayed for the victory for the young man who had come to mean so much to it. Groups of men and women stood out in the street silently watching the doctor when he went up the steps or came out, questioning him. Rose and Mrs. Lennox and Roy, with the trained nurse brought from Topeka, went about the house, silent, lips moving in prayer, faces white and drawn over every movement in the little room.

ONE night, very late, when it seemed likely that Life would flicker out of that strong tenement and close the earthly door to any other tenant, Roy Lennox came out on the porch for a breath of air, his heart crying out for his chum, his soul beating hard at the gates of God's mercy to spare this beautiful life that seemed so necessary.

As he stepped out, he was startled by a movement on the little porch.

There at one end of it, close by the Madeira vine, kneeled a girlish figure—Inez—her hands clasped—tears on her cheeks, no cry to disturb the one within, but a voiceless anguish of appeal. And at the other end of the porch stood, in the shadow, Deacon Allen, his head bowed, the muscles of his face moving convulsively.

Roy went up to the man. He did not know what to say to the girl.

"Is there any hope?" asked the deacon. "The doctor would not answer me when he came out. I thought perhaps—"

"We have done all we can. We must leave the final answer with his God," said Roy, and with a handclasp of the deacon and a glance at the crouching girl, he went back into the house.

CHAPTER IX

THE Expressman was visibly and audibly and externally excited.

This excitement he tried to communicate to his horse and wagon, both of which had been on the retired list for several years but had not actually retired because of financial and other reasons which the Expressman had never communicated to either of them.

But he was now urging both of them, and himself, in the direction of the Santa Fe station, and when he arrived he collided with the edge of the platform so violently that he was thrown off his seat backward into the wagon, where the Agent, who had come to the little window, caught a confused glimpse of legs and arms as the momentarily recumbent figure of the Expressman struggled to the perpendicular, ornamented on his back more or less picturesquely with the excelsior.

Before the Expressman was on his feet, the Agent heard him say in between remarks to the horse, and other exclamations not intended for publication, "Mr. Chase is out of danger! Mr. Chase is out of danger!"

"Hooray!" yelled the Agent, waving a ticket to Osage City out of the window. And he added before going back to the ticket window, "I was just going up on the street as soon as Number Ten got away, to inquire. 'Did the Doc tell you?'"

"Sure! I got it right out of his own mouth. I've been sittin' right out in front of the parsonage in my wagon last two days. An' I see some mighty curious things!" The Expressman lowered his voice. "Two nights ago what do you think I see! I see Inez Clark go up the parsonage steps and kneel down on the porch an'—"

"Do you remember what Mr. Chase said about gossip!" said the Agent, sternly.

"This ain't gossip," said the Expressman.

"What is it?"

"Just human interest. Mr. Chase said it was all right to have that."

"We'll—go ahead," said the Agent, a little doubtfully. "You saw her kneel down on the porch, an'—"

"An' that's all—" said the Expressman. But he added quickly, "Deacon Allen was there that night. He's been terrible worked up over the minister. They say he was cryin' that night when it looked as if Mr. Chase was gone. I never see him cry except when he lost a dollar on a binder."

"But Mr. Chase is going to get well—" the Agent said, lingering by the window to make sure of the good news.

"He sure is, if he don't overeat. Everybody'll be sendin' in chicken pie an' jell an' things. I wouldn't mind bein' him when it's safe to eat again. I'd be willing to exchange pulpits with him any time."

THE Agent had to go back to the ticket window where in his excitement over the news of Mr. Chase's recovery he sold a lady a ticket to Pauline who had asked for one to St. John. After correcting this little mistake, he came back. The Expressman was still picking excelsior out of his clothes and looking very much pleased over the news about Mr. Chase.

"There's another thing I've been noticin' lately," he said as the Agent opened up the key to Lawton.

"Is this more gossip?"

"Naw. More human interest. We're allowed to have that. Miss Burton, she's been going around looking like a ghost during the minister's typhoid. That typhoid has gone awful hard with her."

"Have you seen her lately?"

"No."

"I bet she's gaining today," said the Agent pensively.

"What do you know about it?" said the Expressman jealously.

"Not a thing. You don't, either. But Red Hill won't object any."

"No. They have my consent. An' I'll haul their trunks for nothin' when they go off on their trip."

"Better not talk about this," said the Agent lowering his voice.

"Naw. I never thought of it till you mentioned it."

If the Agent and the Expressman rejoiced over the minister's recovery, what shall be said of Red Hill generally? There had never been a time in its history when it poured out such a collective stream of kindly feeling as it now poured into the little parsonage. Red Hill had never known the rare joy of loving somebody like that. The experience was so new that it did not know how to take it and Howard did not know how to receive it as the days went by.

HE sat propped up in the little bedroom, rapidly convalescing, while Roy and Kate and Rose vied with one another to show their affection for him. The bureau and the little table and two chairs were covered with flowers, and Howard was bewildered by almost hourly messages sent in by neighbors.

"Where'd that bouquet come from?" he asked Roy, who could hardly contain himself over his chum's recovery.

He pointed a white finger at a particularly lurid bunch of flowers evidently personally conducted together, to which there was attached a freight-car tag. Roy brought it up to the bed where Howard could read what was written on it in lead pencil.

REO

"THE GOLD STANDARD OF VALUE"

Reo $\frac{3}{4}$ -Ton "Speed Wagon"

3/4-Ton "Speed Wagon"

Reo Made—Therefore Sturdy On Pneumatic Tires—Speedy

Reo was one of the first to anticipate the demand of that kind of delivery service which calls for celerity as well as dependability.

Reo was one of the first to make a rugged 3/4-ton truck and to mount it on pneumatic tires.

Eighty per cent of all delivery nowadays calls for that combination—sturdy construction that guarantees delivery on schedule; and speed capabilities that promise quick service.

The pneumatic tire is the only solution of that problem.

Of course all business men now know and concede that fact.

But when the first Reo "Speed Wagon" was announced, there was much wagging of heads and much speculation as to whether through "punctures" etcetra, more time would not be lost than gained.

No need to go into that now—the truck itself has given the most conclusive reply to all such objections.

And the immediate future is going to see still greater developments in pneumatic tired trucks.

Why already we see five—yes and ten—ton trucks mounted on pneumatics—up to twelve inches diameter!

Speed—that is the first essential in modern business.

Speedy delivery is the best business getter.

And speed beyond ten or twelve miles an hour is possible only on pneumatic tires.

They save the chassis—relieve the mechanical parts of the wicked shocks of rough roads and bad pavements.

Pneumatics multiply the working life of a truck by two at least.

Less breakages; less wear; more efficiency in mechanical parts, spell lower upkeep at the same time that they guarantee more reliability in performance.

This 3/4-ton Reo being one of the first, represents longer experience as well as sounder engineering.

From the first it proved itself equal to every demand.

Yet the Reo engineers have, from time to time, refined and improved it wherever chance offered.

Being Reo designed and Reo made—every part manufactured in the Reo shops, not "assembled" from units bought from several sources—you have the assurance that it is sturdily built and from the best materials the world affords.

Being pneumatic tired, you may safely drive this Reo as fast as the law allows with full load.

In upkeep—ask your Reo dealer for comparative facts and figures. They will be a revelation to you.

¶ Prudent buyers will not delay ordering the motor cars or motor trucks they need. ¶ Demand is already increasing and will still further increase as our industries get into their war-time stride. ¶ More and more the intelligent business man is coming to realize that we must accelerate—not dwaddle along. ¶ The motor truck will be more necessary than ever—for traffic will be heavier, more goods must be moved. ¶ On the other hand, motor car factories have all curtailed their regular output in order to help out with government work. ¶ Result, an under supply opposed to an over demand. ¶ Obviously, there will not be enough to go round. ¶ A large percentage of prospective buyers will have to be denied. ¶ The tardy will surely be disappointed. ¶ Those who foresee the conditions and protect themselves by immediate decision and prompt placing of orders with definite delivery dates specified, will be counted among the "lucky" when the big drive begins.

Questions and Answers

S. F. H., Mays, Ind. We must have the spirit of forgiveness if we ourselves expect to be forgiven. In the Lord's Prayer this is clearly set forth in these words: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those that trespass against us." To cherish hatred in our hearts and go to the throne of grace in that state is futile. See also Matt. 5:23; 6:14; 18:21, 35; Mark 11:25; Luke 11:4; 17:4; II Cor. 2:7; Eph. 4:32; Col. 3:13; Jas. 2:13; Matt. 5:44; Luke 6:27; Rom. 12:14, 19. Our forgiveness should be ready in the heart and on the lips, even though it be not reciprocated by those who have injured us. We are told to forgive, not merely seven times, but seventy times seven, implying that even toward the hardened offender we should feel more pity than animosity. It may be advisable in some circumstances, for the offender's own sake, that forgiveness should be withheld, just as it is good for some men to be taught, by a sharp lesson, that they cannot do wrong and hope to escape the consequences. But the Christian must not cherish animosity in his heart, nor any vindictiveness, but rather be ready to forgive freely, at the first opportunity and on the slightest sign of contrition. God loves the sinner, though he hates the sin, and we must try by our love rather than by our severity, to follow the divine example. We have known of cases where the injured party broke down all the barriers of hardness and rebellion by extending forgiveness, even before the first sign of repentance on the offender's part, and where such magnanimity bore splendid fruit and transformed an enemy into a true friend.

Mrs. E. C. B., New York City, writes: "After reading the article in this week's Christian Herald, entitled, 'I am that Clown,' I am led to add my little mite to the Bowers Mission. I am an old actress myself, but by the grace of God, instead of falling a wreck by the wayside, as I might easily have done, He has brought me into a safe harbor for which I thank Him day and night."

Evelyn G., Yonkers, N. Y. The Prayer League department will continue to be one of the spiritual features of the Christian Herald during the current year.

Are you, who read this paragraph, helping in any way to cheer up some brave but lonely American boy in camp? If you are not, then read this suggestion from a Christian Endeavorer in Corsica, S. D., and note how quickly it set others to work. Mr. A. B. Hulshes is the vice-president of the local Christian Endeavor Society in the Reformed Church. He writes: "At our Christian Endeavor Society on December 30, I made a suggestion that we get a group of volunteers—as many in number as we have boys in camp—who would write each one letter a week to some one of the boys. This suggestion carried, and volunteers were gotten in less time than it takes to mention it. This week a letter has been sent in the name of the Christian Endeavor Society to each of our boys in camp. Next week, each volunteer will write to a different one. A great deal of good could be done by a big united effort on the part of all Christian Societies along this line. The aim in all the letters will be the same: to have the boys bear in mind that their Christian friends at home are thinking of them."

Reader, Wapello, Iowa. The school and church matter is one that should be decided by the people of the district themselves. Certainly there ought to be enough God-fearing, public-spirited men and women who, by uniting forces, could set the matter right.

Bible Student. How would feigning himself a madman gain David security from the Philistines?

In peril of his life among the Philistines (I Sam. 21:15), David hit on a device the success of which depended on a prevailing sentiment of the East. The peoples of the East have peculiar ideas of devil and spirit possession, and attribute to such cause diseases such as epilepsy, hysteria, lunacy and delirium. They have a respect for bad spirits and fear to touch or injure them, lest they should take

The Land with a Pitiful Past and a Wonderful Future

DO you know Santo Domingo, land of contrasts? It is the cradle of American civilization, and yet half a wilderness. The bones of Columbus lie in one of its cathedrals, and its forests and mountains are almost as wild as when he found them.

It is a land of many poor, and yet there is much gold in its rivers, its forests are filled with precious woods and its soil possesses fertility which centuries of careless cultivation have not impaired.

It is within a week of New York, and yet there are bandit barons in its mountain fastnesses who live in fourteenth century fashion.

It is a country of turbulence and trouble, and of health and beauty and charm—a land with a pitiful past and a wonderful future.

An official booklet on Santo Domingo, richly illustrated, published by the Pan-American Union of American Republics, will be sent free to any reader of the Christian Herald. true, both in religion and morals on the one hand, and in the mental and physical also, that misuse of a faculty or gift leads to its loss. It is a universal law.

D. D. Blauch, Johnstown, Pa. In your issue of January 16 is an article entitled "Prophecy Fifty Years Ago," by Rev. Michael Baxter. When reading this article, my mind went back to years ago when I first began to read the Christian Herald and Signs of the Times. A history of the origin and progress of this valuable paper would be very interesting at this time; I can, however, recall some of its prophetic teachings, which had considerable impression upon me. It was, in fact, one of the things that led me to a closer study of the prophets and their teachings concerning the end of the age. Many of the statements then made were hooted at as sensational rather than Scriptural, like the preaching of Dr. Wild, who about the same time preached in Brooklyn. Dr. Wild was one of the most enlightened exponents of Anglo-Israelism in America. His sermons were considered as wild in imagination as was his name; yet a few years ago, one of the leading New York papers said that many of his statements, made about eighteen years earlier, have come true. He died a few years ago near Toronto, Canada. My impression is that some of his sermons were published in the Christian Herald. Perhaps some one familiar with the facts could enlighten me upon the subject.

Dr. Wild's teachings, we think, were discussed on several occasions in the Christian Herald. Although it did not print his sermons or lectures, it commented upon his views on prophecy, some of which were remarkably clear and precise.

Rev. G. J. Williams, Vicksburg, Miss., writes: "I don't believe I could do without the revenge and affect the injurer in like manner. All sufferers of this class are therefore shunned. Of this peculiar belief David took advantage, and thus gained freedom of movement.

Rev. S. St. Paul, Minn. Why was the birth of Christ announced by the angels to the lonely shepherds?

Dr. C. Geikie says on this point: "To have received such surpassing honor from above, they must have been members, though poor and humble, of that true Israel which included Mary and Joseph, Zacharias and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna—the representatives in those dark days of the saints of their nation in its highest past. They must have been men looking out, in their simple way, toward the visible and eternal, and seeking that kingdom of God for themselves which was one day, as they believed, to be revealed in their nation at large."

Miss G., Brooklyn, N. Y. Please explain John 10:41.

John's mission had no need of miracles. Miracles may be necessary as credentials of a speaker, or to call attention to a message, or to provide illustration of spiritual truths. John came like one of the old prophets and was accepted by people in that character; hence nobody asked for credentials from him. John's message was really the old prophetic message, with the difference only that he told his hearers that the King—the Messiah they had been waiting for—was now close at hand. Besides, miracles were not needed by John, as everybody flocked to hear him. Neither were they required for the illustration of his message, for he offered the rite of baptism, which enabled penitent souls to give outward expression to their change of heart and mind.

J. T. H., Scranton, Pa. When the question "Who art thou?" was asked of Jesus and was prompted by mere curiosity, or when it was asked with the object of getting evidence from his own lips for the purpose of prosecuting him, it would have been unwise to satisfy the questioner. When, however, he was speaking to the woman of Samaria (John 4:26), there was no ambiguity: "I that speak unto thee am he." Under the adjuration of the high priest, too, he announced plainly (Mark 14:62): "Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? And Jesus said, I am."

O. P. F., Milton, Wis. Yes, the peace of God may dwell even in men who go to war. A Christian suffers long and allows his enemy to do much harm to him before he rebels, but there are things not to be endured. A Christian nation suffers long, but finally, in the interest of self-preservation, or for the purposes of a great and righteous cause, must finally take the sword of defense, and this purpose can not be said to be in conflict with God's peace. God is a God of order. He put us on this earth to make it habitable and to live thereon in peace and comfort. If conditions arise that threaten, we certainly have the reasonable right to change them.

The mixed Arabic tribes are regarded as the descendants of Ishmael. Some of these tribes still retain the names of certain of Ishmael's sons, as the Nabatheans, the descendants of Jetur and Naphish (east of the Jordan), the Edomites, the province of Dumah in Arabia, etc. Their tents and camps are scattered over the eastern confines of Palestine and over Arabia from the Egyptian border to the Euphrates River.

Reader, Albany, N. Y. Please give some information on the Gulf Stream.

It is an ocean current in the North Atlantic and takes its name from the Gulf of Mexico. It is chiefly caused by the heaping up of the waters in the warm equatorial current in the Gulf. It flows from the Gulf as a current 2,000 feet deep, and fifty to 100 miles wide, along the east coast of the United States. At Newfoundland it merges with the general eastern movement of the waters of the Atlantic. This movement is caused by the prevailing southeast winds. The movement or "drift" divides; one washes the west coast of the British Isles and reaches the Arctic by three arms; the other goes south along the coast of Spain and west coast of Africa.

The Prayer Battalion

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE Reverend Eva Ryerson Ludgate smiled at me and extended a warm, friendly hand. The morning sunlight, caught in her fluffy, gold-brown hair, discovered an answering sparkle in her eyes. I found myself trying hard to reconcile her likeness to the mental picture that her formal, business-like little note had given me.

"You wanted," I said at last, "to tell me something about a new society?" I hesitated over the last word.

She sank back in my big office chair and clasped her hands, like a very earnest little girl.

"Suppose," she asked rather diffidently, "suppose I begin at the beginning?"

"That's exactly where I want you to begin," I told her. And so, with her steady, earnest gaze on my face, she began.

"I was sent over last summer," she told me, "to attend the conferences in England. You see, I have been an ordained Congregational minister for five years. And of all the meetings that I attended while I was over there, the one that left the most marked impression with me was a single day of prayer which was observed by women."

"All of the women at that great prayer meeting had men in the army or navy. Many of them were the mothers and wives of men who had given their lives for their country. They prayed with a sincerity that I had never before seen. One woman, mourning her two sons, spoke to me. I shall never forget what she said. 'If it had not been for prayer,' she told me, 'I should have gone mad!'"

"That was the birth of my idea—my idea that I want to tell you about today. For I knew that there would soon be women in our country who would need prayer, even as that English woman needed it. I knew that when the casualty lists began to come in the women of America would require divine comfort."

"The idea was with me night and day. I thought of it, I talked of it, I asked advice about it. And finally it all narrowed down to the idea of a 'Prayer Battalion'—a movement to link up the service flag with prayer and with the church."

"THE motives and the methods of the Prayer Battalion are very simple. It is proposed that there shall be a battalion in every church, to meet perhaps once a week. There are no dues, as the society will be entirely supported by voluntary contributions, and the only purpose of it is to band together for prayer and comfort the women having members of their families in war service."

"The Battalion should be founded under the direction of any church or other religious organization, and the chairman should be a woman who has a member of her own family in service, and she should be registered by her pastor. The membership in the Battalion is accomplished by the signing of the Covenant Card, which reads:

"I covenant with God and the members of the National Woman's Prayer Battalion for the duration of the war, to pray daily for Our Country and for the Soldiers, Sailors, Doctors and Nurses who are fighting for us at home and abroad."

"Not only will I pray for them, but I will do all in my power to promote their physical and spiritual well-being."

"I will endeavor to attend meetings for prayer and intercession, and will do my utmost to enlist the help of other patriotic women."

"There should be two classes of members, in each battalion—Service Members and associate members. The service members are those having members of their immediate families in war service, and the associate members are those not having members of their immediate families in war service, but who believe in the principles of Freedom and Democracy for which our men are fighting."

"If possible, the prayer meeting should be held on a Red Cross Day, so that the members of the Battalion can not only pray for their men but work for them. The prayer meetings should be brief, consisting of the reading of a passage of Scripture from the 'Pocket Treasury' (a little book two by three inches long, containing the choicest portions of Scripture. It will be invaluable to the woman who is not familiar with her Bible). The members may pray silently or audibly as they prefer, but it will be found helpful, whenever possible, to mention those prayed for by name. Opportunity should frequently be given for the reading of excerpts of letters received from the front. We are anxious that there shall be no lonely members of the Battalion, and it is hoped that at the close of every Battalion meeting the members will take time to greet the strangers and their friends."

"THE slogan of the Battalion is 'Take time to pray every day,' and the emblem of it is a white cross, to be attached to the red border of the service flag of a church or house in which there are Battalion members. The Battalion now has members in eleven states and expects soon to have a band of praying women that will reach from coast to coast. Its headquarters are at the offices of the New York Federation of Churches, and the executive secretary of that organization, Dr. Walter Laidlaw, is rendering invaluable service in the work of administration."

Miss Ludgate paused, a glorified look on her sweet face.

"When," I asked her, "do you think that the women of our land will most need the Battalion? When their boys go away, or—"

"When the casualty lists come in!" Miss Ludgate told me. "For when the name of the bereaved woman is given, she will receive love and sympathy from the local battalion, and when it is deemed wise, a messenger will be sent to her from headquarters. When the casualty lists come in, the knowledge that other women wish to comfort and aid her in her sorrow will be a great help to any woman!"

"It's such a friendly thing!" I said, rather inadequately.

"It is, indeed," answered Miss Ludgate. "A deaconess said to me a few days ago that she had always longed for some opening that would enable her to approach the women who have service flags in their windows. The Prayer Battalion has given her that opening."

This is the story that Eva Ryerson Ludgate told me. And, though I have not repeated it with her sympathy and conviction (for she has lived with the idea for months, has made it a part of her very being!) I think that her quoted words will catch your interest."

It is a time for prayer, and Miss Ludgate's mission is to call a nation to prayer—to help a nation to meet bravely its Calvary and as bravely to carry its cross.

A LITTLE word of prayer for one who loves you.

Who fights the fight of honor and of right; A little word of prayer to keep his courage And faith serene through terror's darkest night.

A word of prayer to God who watches o'er him. When he is sad (your boy, so far away!) A little word of prayer for one who loves you.

A little word of prayer, and every day!

Miss Ludgate

What Car Style Suits You Best?

Choice of 19 in the Mitchell

SOME folks today want year-'round cars. That is, Sedans and Coupes fit for any weather. So we show them in six styles. Some want Limousines or Town Cars. Those who do want master models. We make luxurious cars to please them.

Some want sport cars. These include Club Roadsters, Club Sedans, and a special touring model. We make four types of these.

Some want demountable tops. Some want Touring Cars, some Roadsters, and in various sizes.

We Please Them All

We make the Mitchell Six in two sizes, at two basic prices, and in 19 body styles.

All are designed by famous designers, who know every attraction any car brings out. And the best are combined in the Mitchell.

Most of them are built in our own body plant under modern efficiency methods. And all our saving goes into extra luxury and beauty.

No other line offers you the range of choice which you can find in Mitchells.

Now in 19 Styles

Here you find all styles, and in a car which holds the top place in its class.

In a hundred ways you get the results of up-to-date factory methods. The Mitchell is built in a mammoth, model plant. In a plant built and equipped under famous efficiency experts to produce this one type economically.

Thus you get prices below other cars of like size and class. You get unusual standards, oversize parts, costly materials, big margins of safety.

You get many features which most fine cars omit.

You get finish and beauty, luxury and comfort which have given the Mitchell a unique distinction.

You get all this in 19 styles of bodies.

You will be amazed at the wealth of attractions which the latest Mitchells offer.

Jesus Restoring Life and Health

International Sunday School Lesson for March 10

Mark 5: 21-43

Christian Missions. I Medical Missions

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

AFTER the calming of the Gerasene demoniac Jesus returned to the Capernaum side once more and again the throngs assembled. Mark tells us two incidents of this period that are especially dear to the Church. One is the story of Jairus's daughter; how one of the synagogue rulers, naturally hostile to Jesus, was driven by his need to beseech Christ's compassion and aid. None ever sought his help in vain. The other little gem of the Gospel, told in eight sentences only, portrays the afflicted woman who touched the hem of Christ's garment in the midst of the throng and received his blessing.

Christ's Attitude Toward the Sick

First of all let us look into the Gospels to see what Christ's attitude toward the sick really was. First of all there was that boundless compassion which distinguishes true Christianity from paganism with its indifference and oftentimes positive inhumanity. Then there was in him an appreciation of the reality of pain and suffering, which makes us wonder how any one can set up the pretense of the unreality of sickness, can teach that suffering is always due to "error" when Christ himself suffered in body and groaned in spirit, though he was so sublimely free from human fault and ignorance. Finally Jesus felt that human misery had a fundamental appeal to conscience and must be ministered unto to the limit of our abilities. It is no wonder then that to Christianity the world owes the hospital, the leper colony and the marvelous ministry of the nursing profession.

And yet it is also true that Jesus never allowed the abnormal to obsess his attention to the exclusion of the healthy, nor the ministry of healing to crowd out the culture of the soul. Spiritual truth has a priority which must not be denied. Neither must a church give itself up to the body and neglect the spirit.

We may therefore recognize joyfully that medical missions have always been truly evangelistic, with good news for sinners as well as for the sick. The medical missionary is a missionary indeed. He never thinks that good health is the sole need of a nation. Everywhere the healing art has been a bell to call men to worship. Everywhere the followers of the Great Physician have been like him in showing by a life of ministry the reality of the Gospel they preach.

Christ's Attitude Toward Death

While our missionaries are not able to raise the dead, literally, yet many of their achievements are spiritually equivalent to that supreme miracle. But with reference to actual physical death what they are able to do is to change men's attitude toward it until they regard death as Jesus did. This is superlatively important. The heathen world is tormented by horrible beliefs and the civilized world is beset by the gravest doubts of any future life at all. Both need the Christlike view.

Some people have told me that the raising of Jairus's daughter does not help them because our children are not restored to us here and now. That of course is true, but it is not the chief point of our lesson. After all the little Hebrew maiden had to die again. The secret of Jesus is this: that death is not irrevocable. We are too apt to think of it as final, irretrievable disaster. Not so with Jesus. He was fond of using the word sleep, which Coningsby Dawson describes as death done up in sample bottles. Sleep is mysterious enough: consciousness gone, the sleeper helpless. But a word recalls the resting soul. So the New Testament teaches us that God is able to awaken his beloved out of the sleep of death. The raising of the daughter of Jairus is a confirmation of our instinctive hope that death is not the end; that a loving Creator will not let his children really die.

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust;
Thou madest man, he knows not why;
He thinks he was not made to die;
And thou hast made him: thou art just.

That same great Christian poet tells us in the opening verses of "In Memoriam" that faith alone is sufficient for us still. The world war has hurried thousands out of this world before their time, and never before was there such a need of Christ's conviction of immortality. So he would have his ministers comfort the bereaved of all nations with the words he gave to the faltering ruler: "Fear not, only believe."

Why Make Ye a Tumult and Weep?

It does seem as though we must take note of Christ's distaste for the funeral customs of his day. You can see it in nearly every one of these Gospel incidents. Fortunately we have no longer the tumult of hired mourners. We do not cry out and mutilate ourselves as the ancients did. We needs must mourn, yet not as those without hope. God understands our sorrow and sense of separation. We must learn to look on death as but a stair,

Built with divinest art,
Up which the deathless footsteps climb
Of loved ones who depart.

Ought we not to discourage the wearing of black? It is so natural to wish to drape one's self in crêpe veils; but it is scarcely Christian. I confess I feel it to be incongruous, after some saintly soul has ascended to the reward of a consecrated life, to receive a letter with a wide black margin from wife or from son. Even those most sorely bereaved had caught a glimpse of glory at the memorial service. Yet custom bade them dress like night instead of dawn.

What are we going to do when our splendid boys give their lives for the great dream of freedom for the world? Make lamentation, wear black, go downcast? Or raise our heads high and smile through tears, as we remember that they have joined the noble army of martyrs for God's cause?

Jesus the Children's Saviour

This is our topic for younger classes, and it is well chosen. Our boys and girls simply cannot grapple with the problem of life and death. Even to the twelve-year-old all our teaching is incomprehensible. But they can and do learn of Jesus' wonderful kindness, such as is shown by his response to this father whose only child was terribly ill. Picture him leaving the crowd to go to help. Tell them of the interruption of the poor suffering woman and of how he paused to comfort and to help her in her affliction. Then dwell on the little girl's conception of Christ, as he took her hand and called her "Talitha," little lamb. She was not afraid of him, we may be sure. She was never after afraid of sickness or of death, we hope. Jesus was her Saviour and her Friend in time of need.

Those of us who are older know that Jesus has truly redeemed all childhood, setting the child in the midst, making us realize the importance of his play and his love, for the future of the Church. Missionaries tell us that civilization may be graded by the attitude toward child-life.

Our Sunday School Workers' Library ought to contain at least one book on Medical Missions. Can we not get such a book now to celebrate this lesson? Choose from this list, or at least send to your own Foreign Missionary Society for free leaflets to use:

We need to know how our representatives have abolished the awful superstitions about evil spirits causing disease and substituted Christian care and modern science instead. What a wonderful incarnation of the spirit of Jesus is the life story of Robert Moffat and David Livingstone and the scores of successors who have labored in the dark places of Africa! The hospital at Uganda with its loving ministries of learned men and gentle women to the scourged negroes of the interior is a powerful example of vital Christianity. Dr. Mackenzie's dispensary at Tientsin, China, with its ministry of brotherhood and cheer, actually resulted in more genuine conversions than the devoted efforts of his fellow workers who confined themselves to preaching alone.

The consecration of all our talents is the lesson of medical missions. Teaching sanitation to the plague-cursed villages of India is a ministry acknowledged of Christ. Caring for the insane Syrians at the Waldmeier Home among the cedars of Lebanon is actually carrying on the fifth chapter of Mark today. Gathering the orphan children of Armenia and healing their diseases is only echoing the gracious "Talitha cumi" of the Lord. Some of our boys and girls are destined to be physicians. If we interpret this lesson aright we may, under God, give a new healer to the waiting millions abroad whose need is so much sorer than our own. David Livingstone left us this challenge:

"You carry out the work which I have begun. I leave it with you." Does it not echo the Master's Commission to the Church?

Young People's Topics for March 10

Making the Most of Ourselves

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. (Eph. 4:11-16.)

TO each of us is given one spark of life, years made up of fast succeeding days, certain talents, certain tendencies and certain environments. Out of these we must construct what is known as our life, our individuality, the thing that people know as us. We may make an awful botch of it. We may build a structure fit to endure throughout eternity. We choose success or failure when we decide our attitude toward Christ, the Saviour of mankind. With His spirit as the governing principle and active force within us, we will be able to mold from this hopeless mass of days, abilities and environments a life complete, fruitful, happy, without serious fault or blemish. We are to come through the knowledge of the Son of God to the perfection of our manhood, even "unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." This is the ultimate spiritual goal which will glorify in its attainment every material good which our lives have gained but, lacking which, material good becomes as ashes of a forlorn hope in our hands. In His power we are to make the most of ourselves. What can we say then if our gift of prayer falling into disuse has left us dumb before the throne of grace; if our gift of sympathy has been palsied by too insistent thoughts of self; if our hand of help to the brother fallen is weakened by some little sin persisted in; if though conscience cries the alarm, our glowing minutes have been wasted in unprofitable diversions or employed in occupations which His Spirit could not bless? What can we say when we face Him at that day? What can we say when we face ourselves?

The great manufacturing plants of today waste nothing. In the lumber mills even the sawdust is burned and the scraps become fiber for furniture and rings and process silk for neckwear and hosiery. The scraps from our clothing enter into shoddy or paper. It is a standard joke that the packing plants lose only the squeal. The by-products of munition-making are fabrics and fertilizers. Leather scraps make fiber board. Only the loose ends of our lives are lost. Industry is a science, but living is more or less of a hit or miss proposition unless it is lived in Christ. Only then does it become a science and only in Him can we make each fragment of our time, our energies and our opportunities unite with the others into a complete life that will represent the most of which we are capable.

Epworth League Topic. Heb. 1:1, 2:4:6, 7.

WHILE painting in definite colors what is to be, the Bible cannot be said to be a book of the future. Its messages are always for today. Thus as in the reference above it says "Today if ye will hear His voice harden not your hearts," in another place it says "Now is the day of salvation." Jesus bade the rich young man to go at once and sell what he had. He sent the blind man immediately to the pool of Siloam. Even the great commission to disciple all nations began with the word "go," imperative mood, present tense, and in this mood and tense it has ever remained. Summing up and fulfilling all of the prophets, Jesus Christ became the voice of God to his generation and to all the generations following. Since the day when the wondering disciples saw their Lord taken up into the clouds of heaven, the voice of God has not been stilled. It has been heard in every age and in every country through the lips of men filled with the Spirit of Christ. It may even speak through you if your heart is filled with his love, your life redeemed by his grace, and your purposes directed by his will. There are many who think they hear the voice of God in the life of today. Some hear it calling the warring nations back to mutual faith and international good will. Some hear it calling for armies that democracy, the child of the Gospel, may triumph over every adversary. Some hear it calling to greater faith and deeper consecration. May it not be that this is the call today of the voice of God in the lives of men?

Preaching the Gospel Out On the Highways

THE Brighton Beach Gospel Work brought its sixth and most successful yearly campaign of open air Gospel service on the seashore to a close early in the fall. The director of the work reports that eighty-two persons, this year, accepted Christ, which makes a total of 461 conversions in six years, while thousands of others asked for prayer. The total attendance this season, $8,408, when added to the number previously reported, makes a total of 850,666 for the last six years. These services are held just off the boardwalk, out in the open at Brighton Beach, Coney Island, on Saturdays and Sundays, and consist of singing, Scripture exposition and short Gospel talks. They are not under the auspices of any society, church or denomination, but are held by volunteer workers from the various churches of Brooklyn, and are supported by free-will offerings. The expense in reaching the more than three-quarters of a million persons has averaged three-tenths of one cent per capita. The proportion of those who accepted Christ to the number of persons reached this year is 1 to 1,000. Some may think that this proportion is small, but according to military statistics it takes one thousand bullets to kill a man, and recent reports from the European war show that it takes a man's weight in lead to put him out of commission. We may not therefore be surprised that the same proportions govern the spiritual realm. Among the speakers at these meetings this year were Mr. A. H. Alexander of Charlotte, N. C., Rev. W. H. Hoople of Brooklyn, Mrs. Edna Rost of the Gospel Tabernacle, Mr. J. N. Morgan, Rev. Fred Schiverea, and Mr. W. E. Stephens, director of the work.

The Food of Foods Is Still Cheap

Quaker Oats Can Save You 75 Per Cent

There is one sunny side to the food problem—oats are plentiful and cheap. And the oat is the greatest of grain foods.

Nutrition costs in Quaker Oats only five cents per 1000 calories. That same nutrition in other foods would cost about as follows:

In eggs, 10 times as much—

In meats—on the average—8 times as much—

In average mixed diet, 4 times as much.

The nutrition you buy for $1 in Quaker Oats would cost you $9 in round steak. It would cost you $20 in chicken.

It would cost you at least $4 in the average run of foods on your table.

Yet the oat stands supreme among grain foods, both in flavor and nutrition. And Quaker Oats is the highest grade of oat food.

Make Quaker Oats your morning meal—not merely a starting dainty. Mix Quaker Oats with your flour foods. It adds a delightful flavor, especially to bread. And it helps to conserve our wheat.

Quaker Oats

The Extra-Grade Vim-Food

It pays to get Quaker Oats. They are flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, luscious oats. We get but ten pounds from a bushel.

The result is superlative flavor—foods vastly more inviting—without any extra price. You will use more oats when you learn how much this Quaker flavor adds.

Quaker Oats Bread

1½ cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)
2 teaspoons salt
½ cup sugar
2 cups boiling water
1 cake yeast
1½ cup lukewarm water
5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water, let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in ½ cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour.

Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes. If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour. This recipe makes two loaves.

Quaker Oats Sweetbits

1 cup sugar, 2 eggs, 2 teaspoons baking powder, 1 tablespoon butter, 1 teaspoon vanilla, 2½ cups uncooked Quaker Oats.

Cream butter and sugar. Add yolks of eggs. Add Quaker Oats to which baking powder has been added, and add vanilla.

Beat whites of egg stiff and add last. Drop on buttered tins with a teaspoon, but very few on each tin, as they spread. Bake in slow oven. Makes about 65 cookies.

Quaker Oats Muffins

2/3 cup Quaker Oats, 1½ cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 4 level teaspoons baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, ½ teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar. Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter; sift in flour and baking powder; mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

WANTED AN IDEA! THINK OF SOME SIMPLE THING TO PATENT. Protect your ideas, they may bring you wealth. Write for "Needed Inventions," and "How to Get Your Patent." RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

THE other day, fellow Adventurers, I had occasion to run up to a farm community in the northern part of Westchester County, State of New York, and had an adventure in neighboring which I think you would like to hear about. The region is a prosperous one, and exceedingly beautiful. In its glistening winter snows, it seemed like a child's dream of fairyland.

We drove from the station to my friend's farm, through a still, sparkling-white world. The hills were like white glass. The trees were inky-black silhouettes. The half-frozen snow of the road glittered like mica. I had never seen anything lovelier!

My first few hours at my friend's farm—which stands on a hillock and commands a glorious sweep of dazzling white valley and distant, shining hills—were spent in breathless enjoyment of the beauty all around me. Then my friend called out that she was going around among the neighbors on some errands, and that if I cared to come along I could. Did I want to go along? Well! You'd have to live in the city for a while to know just how I felt.

Muffled to our noses, and slipping and sliding over the glassy ice of path and field, we laughingly made our way to the nearest farmhouse: a big, comfortable one. And right here I must confess that I spent the remainder of the morning at that one neighbor's, while my friend went about her errands. For I found, at that farm, a wide-awake, restless, talented, lonely young girl, who rebelled awfully at the monotony of life in that community and longed to get away. It wasn't (she explained) that she didn't like every one there; she did. Her family had lived there for three generations. This community—this farm—were her heritage. She loved them, in a way.

"But it's so dead here!" she said bitterly. "There's never anything going on!"

That was challenge enough for me. (You know, it really isn't safe to talk community doings—or lack of doings—in my hearing!) Off came my hat, and a few mufflers and sweaters and coats. And a moment later, my new little neighbor and I were thrashing the whole thing out.

"Haven't you any good times at all here?" I asked. "Parties, or club meetings; anything to break up the monotony? Surely there must be something!"

"Well," she confessed, "we have a club for the older people. But the young people hardly ever get together."

"Then," I replied earnestly, "it's time something was started! Why not start it yourself? You can, here in the country, where you know every neighbor for miles around. In the city—off in some little forlorn apartment—you'd find out the real meaning of loneliness. I know, for I've lived in both the country and the city. I tell you, the so-called 'advantages' of the big towns can't take the place of old friends and neighbors. And as for those very 'advantages,' they can be had right out in the country if any community will really make an effort to have them."

"What do you mean?" she asked.

I TOLD her what certain wide-awake rural communities, scattered over the land, had accomplished. I told her about:

1. A little village in California which has had the pluck and determination to erect an "Arts Club," where ambitious young painters exhibit, musicians hold recitals, and the club gives a monthly reception (with a good program), to which the whole community is invited.

2. About a town which has built, in the woods just outside it, a little open-air theater. Here, every summer, a play or "pageant" is given, every one in the town, who will, taking part. This pageant is a source of revenue for the town. But it means far more than this. It is usually based on the history of the region. It unites the hearts and talents of all the people. And it gives the town a big interest all the year round.

3. The spelling and singing schools recently described in Adventures in Neighboring.

4. A little town in Massachusetts that started a free library from a handful of books.

5. The reading-circle, sewing-class, and athletic association we have heard of through the exchange columns of this Department.

And as I told my little rebellious, lonely neighbor about these undertakings of other plucky women, her shoulders straightened resolutely, her face lighted with eagerness, and when I left she followed me to the door, promising to "get something started" at once, no matter how simple it was.

"I wish we could have that singing-school," she laughed. "It would be lots of fun! And it might lead to bigger things!"

"Of course you can have it!" I responded. "And there's no telling what it may lead to: perhaps to a big Arts Club here, where you could study under the very best city teachers. You know," I added, "there is many an artist or musician who, if he knew you had a center of art started here, and if your club would invite him to spend a week-end out here now and then, would gladly criticize your work. All artists are idealists, and lovers of homemade cake and sleigh-rides. Try them, and see. You'll get help and advice that money couldn't buy!"

As I picked my uncertain way back toward my friend's farm, I turned for an encouraging wave. Our little neighbor was smiling at me from a window.

HERE is an adventure which will rejoice their hearts, and which may offer a hint to some thoughtful adult!

The "Want to Know" Club

For two winters I found the following idea very successful in arousing and interesting the young folks of my community.

I first sent an invitation to some thirty young people, asking them to meet at my house on a certain evening if they wished to know "Why?" Their curiosity aroused, they all came! I had the rooms decorated with question-marks, and a simple lunch ready. At table I announced my plan: that we organize ourselves into a club for study of the common things around us. I told them I had always wanted to know the "Whys and Wherefores" of the things we used every day; and suggested we find out together, having some good fun along with our study. Their response was enthusiastic. And when (to test out the "study" part of my plan) I picked up the salt-cellar, then the pepper, then some glass, and asked questions about them no one knew anything. Did they want to learn? Well, I wish you could have seen their eagerness!

We named ourselves the "Want to Know Club." As our badge, we adopted the question-mark. I was elected president, and at once arranged where we should meet next time. For our first subject I selected "Potatoes," giving out thirty topics on the potato, each member to study up and give us a little talk on his particular item. We also planned the supper for our potato meeting. It was to consist of nothing but potatoes, so we had to think hard. We decided to have them fried, baked, scalloped, made into cake and used in so many different ways that besides having fun over it, many of us learned how to use the common potato. Each member was to bring one potato item for the menu.

That potato evening was a great success. Clever decorations, and place cards (with jingles) stuck in potatoes, showed originality and imagination. We gave our talks while at the table, each one rising. It was all good fun and very informal. I started the ball rolling by giving a history of the potato bug, passing around some colored drawings. Then we had the origin of the potato, which brought in quite a bit of history; then the countries where grown; the various kinds of potato; the keeping qualities; the cultivation and handling of the various kinds; and the transportation problem. The remarks made by a young fellow about seventeen on the transportation of potatoes were wonderful, showing how thoroughly he had investigated the subject.

This potato meeting was followed by an "orange" evening, and, at Easter time, an "egg" evening. The subjects are endless, and can be made absorbing, even exciting. For this, a leader is required: some one with enthusiasm who will plan the subjects weeks in advance. For instance, we once sent to Florida for orange blossoms and facts as to how the fruit was packed.

I will not dwell further on this, but hope our successful adventure will be tried out by some other community.

Mrs. N. E. BARNARD.

How I should love to help start a "Want to Know" Club in certain rural communities I have lived in, where the boys had no gathering-place but the corner store, and the girls had nothing in the way of companionship. For young folks will have diversion! More and more, communities are beginning to realize this, and to provide wholesome fun right there at home. Often some one man or woman has had the vision to see this, and to get things started.

HERE is an instance of that: an adventure from a dear little Vermont neighbor who is an invalid confined to a wheel chair:

Combatting the Pool Room

Here in our town, we thought we had done everything to throw the right influences around our young folks, as we have a beautiful church and a good graded school. Yet, as we had provided no wholesome amusement, the town pool-room became a menace to our boys and young men. Here they gathered, night after night, hearing the worst sort of language and being surrounded by evil influences. I was told about this, one day, by an unhappy mother, who expressed the wish that the place should burn down. I told her we must combat the pool room by offering our boys and young men some wholesome amusement and a decent gathering-place. I promised to see what I could do to help.

I appealed to the teachers, asking them to lend a hand and keep quiet about it. They agreed gladly, and set to work. A snowshoe hike was planned, and proved to be a success. Then Union Hall was rigged up for basket ball, which met with great enthusiasm. Now our boys and young men have fine times there, instead of at the pool room, which is gradually losing its hold on them.

Mrs. E. C. DANA.

Just think, dear neighbors, of the boys and young men of a whole community being helped by one delicate little woman in a wheel-chair! Doesn't it make you stop and think?

HERE, third on our program, is another delightful adventure along lines of community fun.

A Literary Society

I have been greatly interested in "Adventures in Neighboring," and thought maybe the other neighbors would like to hear what my neighborhood is doing this winter.

In a schoolhouse, ten miles from a very small town, we hold school on week days; church and Sunday school on Sundays; and our literary society on Saturday nights. The very same people, for the most part, attend all three occasions: some coming six or seven miles to be present. Our literary society is held every year during the winter months; but each year we try to add new features. This winter the society chose two leaders who, in turn, chose sides as for a spelling match, each side being required to give a program. The side giving the best program was to be served with an "oyster supper" by the losing side, outside persons acting as judges.

Well, these programs were certainly fine! They included up-to-date plays, readings, recitations, and music of various kinds. Delicious refreshments were served each evening, and a small admission fee from the audience paid all expenses. The literary society expects, in the near future, to take the best from each program and give it in a nearby town. I hope this will suggest to some other community a way of having wholesome fun.

Mrs. DUNCAN CALDER.

THIS has been rather a sober meeting, dear Adventurers; but after all, life is serious for most of us right now. And besides, our earnest moments are our noblest. I hope that out of today's earnest visit will come beautiful adventures; that each one of us will hold out to some lonely or needy neighbor (between now and our meeting a fortnight hence) a "cup of cold water" in His Name.

Of all sad tales of missionaries, the saddest, which I hear about once a week on the average is: "When I came here, I could have bought that whole plot for—" an amount about one-fifth what the price is today. Present-day recruits to the mission field will be able to say the same thing. Prices are rising with living conditions, and the very agencies that have induced progress have suffered from it by the increased cost of land and buildings. I have never seen a single piece of mission property that is not worth much more now than it was when it was bought. Unearned increment represents a large part of missionary assets today.

China is covered with day-schools, which would not exist were it not for Christian missions. The greatest need in native evangelistic work is the ability to read and write, and this need is being ministered to by thousands of schools at which an American would laugh, but which are bringing a new day into the village life in China. Often the missionary supplies nothing for these small schools except the place in which the school is held, which is very often the dingy room of an old house. The teacher chosen is one known for his Christian character, and his only pay is what he can get in the way of tuitions. Obviously, college graduates cannot be expected to enter Christian work in this way. Sometimes the mission gives the teacher a small salary of five dollars or so a month and lets him have the tuitions that he can gather from the students. Of course, the amount of tuition is fixed by the mission. Many teachers have developed good schools under this system, but the best men are in such demand that they are usually hired outright by the mission, which hires the buildings and pays all the bills and receives what fees there are. Often the preacher and his wife assist in all types of these schools.

The interesting fact is that in thousands of dingy hovels all over China today Christian and secular instruction is being given at very little cost to thousands of the boys and girls of China, many of whom come from wealthy homes but find in such humble day-schools better instruction than anything the government is yet furnishing. Government competition in this field is rapidly improving, according to the plan advocated by C. T. Wang, of building the educational system on the lines of a pyramid, with a broad, strong foundation, rather than spending public money on universities and colleges. China does not need university graduates as much as it needs a populace that can read and write. Primary schools are inexpensive and efficient. Here is where the first big competition between mission and government schools will come.

THE big Chinese merchant is as honest as a December day is long. He is even more honest than that, and his word is as good as his bond. The big Japanese merchant is as honest as any man is whose practice is to kill the goose every time he sells a box of matches. The Japanese servant is as honest as any one I know, including fraternity brothers who "borrow" what they need from a fellow's wardrobe. The Chinese servant has to have shifty eyes in order to watch his master and find ways of beating him at the same time. Even the missionary, in saving the morals of an entire race, is too busy to prevent his servant from making a "squeeze" play every now and then. Some of them even steal home while the missionary snoozes and allows petty dishonesty to flourish under his own roof. A missionary has to eat, and cooks are few and far between; so he preaches while his cook practices.

No one can explain the paradox of Sino-Japanese honesty, so my snap judgment may be as good as the next one's. The big Chinese merchants have learned through the centuries that honesty is the best policy, and they act accordingly. Japanese servants know that dishonesty and a jail record are consecutive experiences, so they are honest. The Japanese merchant was formerly a social outcast who had to use his wits to beat the gentry, and he has not yet learned that steady trade is better than immediate profits. The Chinese servant lives among soft-hearted people in a land where the police system and department of justice are not well developed. As far as non-Christian lands are concerned honesty is not a race characteristic but a result of long experience. The Chinese have a tendency toward gambling, and the most honest merchant may be too avaricious to be a good banker.

The most surprising thing to me in Japan was the large variety of opinion and feeling on various questions. I had supposed that Japan thought and acted as a unit. But there seems to be no more unity of thoughts and desires than there is in the United States. Japan is undergoing an evolution which is the result not of unity but of difference of opinion. In all things except those directly connected with the emperor, the Japanese are developing through conflict of diverse desires and beliefs.

In Chusan, on the other hand, the thing that impresses me most of all is the sameness of outlook and thought. Peking is a distant city. Politics is the game of the few. Political movements concern only a certain class. Meanwhile, China plods along just as she has plodded, filthy, immovable, satisfied with little, untouched with modern thought. Enough examples can be found to prove that this is not entirely true, and this opinion is given not as a universal truth, but as a contrast with life in Japan.

Leaders in China are seeking democracy and a republican form of government with a zeal that cannot be matched in Japan, where a party of elder statesmen and a divine emperor form a strong conservative class. In Japan, the people are progressive, the government conservative. In China, the government is so progressive that it cannot catch up with itself, but the laud holds uncounted millions of those who welcome any change that makes life more comfortable, but who are strongly conservative in every way. The Japanese are light and vivacious. The Chinese are heavy and solid. The one accomplishes. The other endures.

Consecration and Service

IN a recent union tabernacle meeting Evangelist E. J. Forsythe, a member of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, had unusual opportunity to present to the people the cause of patriotism and to make an appeal for renewed and increased Christian consecration.

Dr. Forsythe has two sons who have been associated with him in evangelistic work, both of whom have joined the army as soldiers and are now overseas with the Canadian forces; and along with them went Mr. J. H. Rhodes, who has been pianist with the party for several years. These three young men were in the tabernacle service on Friday night prior to their departure for Europe. At the close of the sermon Dr. Forsythe asked these young men to come to the front and reconsecrate themselves fully to Christ for service, not only for their country but also for the Master. As soon as they had responded to the call he asked for all young men under twenty-five years of age who were Christians and who desired to make a full surrender of their lives to God to come and stand with them, and in an instant many responded. Then a call was made for all young men under twenty-five who would accept the Lord Jesus Christ as Saviour and King to come forward, and again the response was immediate and large. The young men coming under these calls completely filled the space in front of the platform. It was a wonderful service and made a deep impression upon all those present.

Bible Students and Christian Workers

Do you know your Bible? Do you feel the need of a more thorough, practical working knowledge of the Word of God? Are you awake to the means of securing it economically while engaged in your usual occupation? This means is by correspondence.

Correspondence Bible Study

For all unable to attend a Bible Institute, correspondence Bible study is a practical, efficient and economical method of securing a deeper, clearer knowledge of the Bible. A Tennessee student writes:—"What marvelous light I have received through these lessons! Long, long years I pondered over things in the precious Book that I now understand." You will become just as enthusiastic as soon as you start your first course. We cannot urge too strongly all who wish a more thorough knowledge of God's Word to take up the work with us now.

The Moody Bible Institute

offers eight strong courses for systematic Bible study by correspondence. It has a fully equipped department, exclusively devoted to teaching by correspondence. You will be instructed by competent, practical Christian teachers.

Over 5000 students in all parts of the world last year studied one or more of our courses. Thousands of Christian people will this year begin correspondence study for the first time. Will you be one of them?

For Swollen Veins

Absorbine Jr. THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT

That Absorbine, Jr., would relieve Varicose Veins was discovered by an old gentleman who had suffered with swollen veins for nearly fifty years. He had made many unsuccessful efforts to get relief and finally tried Absorbine, Jr., knowing its value in reducing swellings, aches, pains and soreness.

Absorbine, Jr., relieved him, and after he had applied it regularly for a few weeks, he told us that his legs were as smooth as when he was a boy and all the pain and soreness had ceased.

Thousands have since used this antiseptic liniment for this purpose with remarkably good results.

Absorbine, Jr., is made of oils and extracts from pure herbs and when rubbed upon the skin is quickly taken up by the pores; the blood circulation in surrounding parts is thereby stimulated and healing helped.

WHAT WOULD YOU DO WITH $1,000.00?

BETTER DECIDE RIGHT AWAY, FOR YOU MAY GAIN THAT SUM IN THE

Why YOU Should Compete

You will have just the same opportunity to select the best verses for the 30 pictures as any other person anywhere—understand that fully. The Bible verses to choose from are limited to 2,000 in number, and for handy reference they are published in a convenient book-let which may be secured by anyone. In thus limiting the number of verses we make the Picture Study a matter of judgment in the selecting of the best verses, not a matter of extensive Bible knowledge.

When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night and departed into Egypt. Matt. 2:14.

See the example picture above, and beside it the Bible verse which we think is well illustrated by the picture.

We show this picture and how a verse "fits" it, to give you an example of how you will find a verse, among the 2,000 we publish in the Reference Book, to "fit" each one of the actual Bible Picture Study pictures.

There is nothing hard about it, or hard to understand. Just go through the Reference Book, marking off the verses which in your opinion best describe or apply to the 30 pictures and then write your chosen verses in the Answer Book and send it in to us. Those who select the best verses for the pictures will receive the 1,001 rewards.

JUST think for a pleasant moment—what you would you do if, as one of the many rewards of the Bible Picture Study, you should be sent the first prize of $1,000.00 in cash?

Every person has so many places for such a sum, and the war has brought so many more good uses for our savings—now think a moment! Really decide. What would you do with $1,000.00 in cash?

Or $750.00 in cash, second reward; or $500.00 in cash, third reward. Or any one of the 1,001 rewards?

Of course the spiritual and mental rewards of competing in the Picture Study you would keep for yourself all your life, and as a result of learning more and understanding more of the Holy Bible you might through your personality pass these gifts on to others. There are a multitude of rewards in the Picture Study, and those of the greatest value should not be forgotten just because they cannot be placed in a bank or counted out in the presence of others. The best rewards are expressed in terms of character and conduct.

What will you do with your Bible reward from the Picture Study, too?

Convenience of the Outfit

How simple and enjoyable our Outfit makes participation in the Picture Study!

In the Reference Book, called International Bible Readings, appear all the 2,000 Bible verses from which to select those that in your opinion fit the 30 pictures best.

In the Answer Book you will find 30 blank pages, on which you will write down the verse or verses you choose for each picture. You are permitted to submit as many as five verses for each picture, if you wish. All 30 pictures are now included with each Outfit. If you enter now you will receive them all, just as though you entered earlier. Join the Picture Study today, and realize what entertainment, what joy, what peace and inspiration there is in this simple home Bible competition!

General Pershing Calls for More Chaplains

THE following cablegram has been received at the War Department, Washington, D. C.:

"To the Adjutant General, Washington, For the Secretary of War.

"1. In the fulfillment of its duty to the nation, much is expected of our army, and nothing should be left undone that will help in keeping it in the highest state of efficiency. I believe the personnel of the army has never been equalled and the conduct has been excellent; but to overcome entirely the conditions found here requires fortitude born of great courage and lofty spiritual ideas. Counting myself responsible for the welfare of our men in every respect, it is my desire to surround them with the best influence possible. In the fulfillment of this solemn trust, it seems wise to request the aid of the churches at home.

"2. To this end it is recommended that the number of chaplains in the army be increased for the war to an average of three per regiment, with assimilated rank of major and captain in due proportion, and that a number be assigned in order to be available for such detached duty as may be required. Men selected should be of the highest character, with reputations well established as sensible, practical, active ministers or workers, accustomed to dealing with young men. They should be in vigorous health, as their services will be needed under most trying circumstances. Appointees should of course be subject to discharges for inefficiency, like other officers of the National Army.

"It is my purpose to give the chaplain corps through these forces a definite and responsible status and to outline, direct and enlarge their work into co-operative and useful aid to the troops. (Signed) PERSHING"

"Mother" Clarke, Soul-Winner

WHEN Dr. Philip Yarrow arose to speak at the funeral of Mrs. Sarah D. Clarke, "Mother" of the Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago, recently, he quietly said: "Here lies one of the great women in the history of the church." Many sons and daughters of the mission and many Christian workers, among whom was Mrs. William A. Sunday, wife of Billy Sunday, who was converted at the Pacific Garden Mission, were gathered at the funeral service, which was held in the First Congregational Church, Morgan Park, Ill.

Mrs. Clarke, when a young woman, upon the solicitation of a college friend, determined to become a Christian. A few years later, seeking lost souls became the passion of her life.

After the great fire in 1871, in Chicago, most of the churches did not rebuild in the business district of the city, a condition which left little invitation to a better life for those who had fallen low in sin in that section of Chicago. Among these "down-and-outs" Colonel and Mrs. Clarke began their work. "A little room with a seating capacity of about forty; a few wooden benches; a wheezy organ; some home-made mottoes and oil lamps hanging on the side walls, comprised our paraphernalia," wrote Mrs. Clarke, describing their first quarters. While her husband preached, she would go about in the audience of drunken and rough men to keep order, and many a boisterous fellow was quieted by the presence of the calm but authoritative little woman.

Since that year, 1877, up to the present time, the Pacific Garden Mission has kept its doors open every night to all who wished to enter. At times when finances were low and the mission could not hold its own, Mrs. Clarke gave up her little trinkets and valued personal articles which she had received in former days, that the mission might not be forced to close its doors. For 6,000 nights, in all kinds of weather, in company with her husband, and after his death alone, she went daily from Morgan Park to Chicago, to the mission which she loved more than any other spot in the world. For thirty years she never failed to pray in the Cook County jail with every criminal who was condemned for murder.

Six years before her death she was incapacitated for work by an injury, but she sat daily in her room in Morgan Park and wrote letters to "her children," as she called the converts of the mission, and unceasingly prayed for them. "It takes a long time to pray," she would say. "There's a whole country to pray for. I must pray first for those in prison, in the jails and penal institutions; then for the saloon keepers, that they might be converted."

Among the hundreds whom Mrs. Clarke together with her husband helped out of darkness into light were Billy Sunday, the late Harry Monroe, and "Mel" Trotter, the two last-named being well known Rescue Mission workers. E. S. SCHUSTER.

The World's Coal

THE National City Bank of New York has issued a compilation which shows that the coal output of the United States in 1917 is greater than that of any previous year, being nearly 45 per cent. of the total world production. In 1860 we produced less than 10 per cent., or only 15,000,000 short tons; in 1917 our production is estimated at 650,000,000 short tons. Practically all the anthracite coal is mined in Pennsylvania, which is by far the largest coal-producing state. The estimated supply of the United States is 3,527,000,000,000 short tons, China coming next with 1,500,000,000,000, of which she mined in 1913 a scant 15,432,000 tons. Great as is our production, we have taken out since 1800, when coal mining commenced, only about one-half of one per cent. of the original supply. While we have the largest supply and the largest production, our exports are less than other countries with a smaller supply, Great Britain and Germany, with 82,000,000 and 37,000,000 short tons respectively in 1913, both exceeding the United States with only 23,000,000 short tons. In 1917, however, we have increased our exports by about 20 per cent. Before the war the steamships of the world consumed about 75,000,000 tons a year, valued at about $250,000,000. The total amount is now probably much less, on account of the smaller number of vessels and the increased use of oil as fuel.

Christian Science Replies

IN your issue of December 26, the reverend doctor who discussed "The End of the Age and How to Meet It" makes reference to Christian Science and other forms of Theosophy and Buddhism, with the same lack of warrant that is found in the implication that this religion has gained its hold in the world through "woman's susceptibility." In classifying Christian Science with Theosophy and Buddhism he has fallen into the common error of grouping religious beliefs which have nothing whatsoever in common. Between the teachings of Christ Jesus, which the Christian Scientist constantly strives to emulate, and the doctrine of the reincarnation of Theosophy, the Nirvana and Karma of Buddhism, there is a gulf as wide as that between the philosophy of Plato and the Gospel of St. John. Christian Science is the religion of Love, the teaching and practice of Jesus reproduced in the twentieth century and demonstrated as the way to present-day salvation. Whether its hold is due to woman's susceptibility may be judged from attending the Sunday services and Wednesday evening meetings, or public lectures, where will be found as large a percentage of men as in any other religious denomination, and among them a goodly sprinkling of business and professional men, who find in this teaching the religion of the Master exemplified and made plain.

New York City. ALBERT F. GILMORE.

People who are always talking about doing their share have the arithmetic of life figured down mighty fine.

We may talk of streets of gold and gates of pearl, but the presence of Christ and the absence of sin will make heaven.

DO YOU KNOW

MOTHER—How to make a homemade fireless cooker?

FATHER—How to plant a vegetable garden?

DAUGHTER—How to can home-products for sale?

SON—How a homemade "drier" for fruits and vegetables is constructed?

ALL THE FAMILY—How to cut the meat bills down? What food little children require? How to store farm produce? What "goodies" honey will make? What a cheap, nourishing meal is? How to keep food in a small apartment? How to preserve eggs? What to put in the school lunch-box? How to make cheese serve for more expensive food? How the new breads are made?

Uncle Sam's Advice to Housewives

That Book of a Thousand Helps Which Not Alone the Housewife but EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY Will Find Invaluable!

A Book for Home Folks, Compiled from Government Bulletins and Endorsed by the Food Administration and the United States Department of Agriculture

Uncle Sam's Advice to Housewives (a beautifully bound book in two volumes) is the first collection of United States Household Bulletins ever brought out in book form.

While some of these bulletins may be had free of cost from the government, others would have to be paid for.

By buying these two volumes, you procure (in condensed, everyday, practical form) the very best household and home helps Uncle Sam has ever thought up for the assistance of Mrs. America.

All the "theoretical" talk has been—for your benefit—eliminated from the bulletins enclosed within the covers of these two valuable volumes. So that only the most "homey," practical, usable information has been retained.

These books are not a set of food-conservation orders, although some hints along this line have been included. These books are not the kind you will put in the glass-lined bookcase out of the dust. For you will find them too helpful for that. Eventually they will find their way to your kitchen shelf—just where you can seize them when there is something you want to know that a cook-book cannot tell you—for instance—

How to fashion, quickly and from the materials at hand, a homemade fireless cooker!
How to cook cabbage so it will not upset the digestion of the family!
What to put in the children's lunch-basket so that they will be sufficiently nourished!
How to make yesterday's left-overs into a palatable soup!

These are only a few random hints. There are hundreds of others, applicable to everyday home-kitchen needs. There is a whole chapter on "cheese," for instance; and one on "honey," and another on making "bread" at home. And in the chapter on "meats," there are splendid suggestions as to cutting down the meat bills, without lessening the nourishment, by combining meat with other foods, extending its flavor and nutritive qualities.

And Do You Know, Also

That this is not alone a book of kitchen hints—not alone (despite its title) a book for the women-folks?

That every member of the family will enjoy the book and find in it the answer to some vexing problem?

The young mother will find a wonderfully illuminating chapter on "food for young children."

The high-school girl will find some of the most delectable (and economical) candy receipts in existence. And she will learn, too, in the "honey" chapter how to prepare new refreshments (at little cost) for her next party.

The father of a family, or an enterprising son, will find—in the remarkable chapter on "The Home Vegetable Garden"—full directions, down to the smallest detail, for the planting and raising of a kitchen garden.

The housewife, with more fruit on hand than the family can use while fresh, will find here two splendid methods of canning—the sort of canning that never spoils and which can be placed on the market if the housewife so desires.

Any member of the family, after reading this book, can store (so that there will be no danger of spoilage) or dry for future use all vegetables and fruits not eaten or canned. Full descriptions of how to make the storehouses and how to construct the driers are given.

Pickling, salting, and the preserving of eggs are made so clear—in certain chapters in this book—that a child could follow the directions.

And last, but by no means least, the book states clearly, simply, just what food, and what daily amounts (roughly speaking) the average family requires for its daily health. Are we eating too much—these days? Perhaps not. But it may be that we are eating the wrong foods, if we would avoid doctor's bills and not empty the family purse. There is a chapter devoted to this practical question.

And so, a "word to the wise is sufficient." We would like our subscribers to have the benefit of obtaining this book, at these rates. And this notice is merely to let you know that requests for this book are coming in from the general public. These requests we cannot very well ignore. And the edition is limited. So—if you have any intention of buying Uncle Sam's Advice to Housewives, enter your order at once.

We will send a copy of "Uncle Sam's Advice to Housewives," Volumes one and two, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one $250 year, for

Wilson's war aims, declared that all Britain was solidly back of him, and expressed his sorrow at the loss of life on the Tuscany.

Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, former British Ambassador to Washington, died suddenly at Ottawa, Canada, on February 14. He had served his nation in various diplomatic posts for over twenty years, being appointed Ambassador at Washington in 1912.

250,000 FOR SHIPYARDS. During the week of February 10, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, acting through the State Councils of National Defense, engaged in a nation-wide endeavor to enroll 250,000 metal-workers, electrical workers, carpenters and ship-builders, not for immediate work in the yards, but as a labor reserve from which men may be called as the yards are ready to put them to work. The first half of the week saw thousands of men of all ages and of every nationality crowding the registration office, the week ending with about half of the desired number enrolled. The registration of men was continued.

COMMERCE BOWS TO WAR. President Wilson on February 15 issued a proclamation making effective on the following day a license system covering the entire export and import trade of the nation. The action was taken in the interest of the public safety. The Shipping Board, the War Trade Board, the Railroad administration, the Food administration and the War and Navy Departments will cooperate in the reorganization of American Commerce necessary under the proclamation. It is expected that the reorganization of routes and the elimination of relatively unnecessary imports and exports, with the full utilization of the 500,000 tons of neutral shipping under American charter, will release about 1,000,000 tons of ships for use in the transporting of men and materials to France.

The Progress of the War

THE principal events of the War during the past week have occurred along what was once the Eastern front. Germany and her Allies finally succeeded in making a peace treaty with the Ukrainian People's Republic, the treaty being signed at Brest-Litovsk on February 11. The treaty provided for the ending of the state of war, for an evacuation of occupied territories, and for the institution of diplomatic and consular relations. The contracting parties mutually renounced reimbursements of their war costs and prisoners of war were to be allowed to return home or to move freely. The item of principal interest in this treaty was the last which provided for the immediate resumption of economic relations and the exchange of goods.

The Republic of the Ukraina will embrace the former Ukraina, Volhynia and part of Russian Poland. Ukrainian territory in the Austrian province of Galicia in which there are 4,000,000 Ukrainians will remain under the Austrian flag.

The population of the Ukrainian Republic is in the neighborhood of 28,000,000, and it is possible that the food stuffs in storage in this granary of Russia may somewhat relieve the stress of hunger in the Central Empires.

Trotsky and the Bolshevik representatives refused to conclude a peace with Germany on the terms proposed by the German representatives. Instead Trotsky announced that a state of peace had ensued between Russia and the Central Powers and that the Russian army, except a force retained as a border guard, would be demobilized. Later came reports that demobilization had been halted and that a Red Guard was being organized for the defense of the revolution. By refusing to sign any commitment Trotsky placed the German occupying forces in a peculiar position. They were practically in the position of having secured something and not knowing what to do with it, and it became apparent as the facts were studied by both Teuton and Allied observers that it would be necessary for Germany to maintain a considerable force of men along the old battle-line until some definite assurance could be obtained against an invasion of the occupied provinces by the Russian Revolutionary Army. A German army council at Imperial headquarters was reported on February 15 to have decided that the attitude of Trotsky and the expiration of the armistice on February 14 restored the former state of war. Resumption of military activity was suggested with Petrograd as its ultimate objective. The Central Powers were reported to have given an ultimatum to Rumania demanding that she conclude peace. This was later denied, although it was said that Rumania had been offered the Russian province of Bessarabia, which her troops now occupy, in exchange for the Dobrudga now occupied by the Bulgarians. The Rumanian cabinet resigned on February 10. Until Germany succeeds in eliminating Rumania she will need to maintain a considerable army also on the old southeastern front.

In Italy the Italians and Allied artillery were kept busy during the week repulsing attempts of the Austrians to regain the positions recently lost west of the Brenta River.

The front in France and Belgium became increasingly active during this week, and Secretary Baker, in his regular review of the military situation, declared that the signs more and more pointed toward the imminence of the great German offensive which has been expected since December.

Berlin reported on February 9 the capture of American prisoners near Xivray, 10 miles east of St. Mihiel. Gen. Pershing reported on the same day that an American patrol had been ambushed in No Man's Land on the preceding night and that 5 Americans had been killed, that 4 were missing and one wounded.

All along the Western front the mutual "body grabbing" raids have been in progress each side seeking to secure persons from the other in order to identify the troops facing them. In these raids the Allies seem to have had slightly the best of it.

The French, in a raid which amounted to a minor attack, eliminated a German salient south of Tahure in the Champagne on February 13, attacking and penetrating enemy trenches over a front of half a mile to the depth of over 1200 yards, organizing the ground gained. The Germans did not counter attack. 177 prisoners were taken. French army headquarters reported that in this attack "Very effective support" had been rendered by American batteries, although it was not stated whether these batteries were working under direct American command or were batteries in training serving under French general officers.

The English made raids in the Cambrai area and in the neighborhood of Lens.

During the week submarines sank 13 British vessels of over 1600 tons, 6 under that tonnage and 3 fishing craft. The Italian losses were 4 steamers of more than 1600 tons.

It was officially announced on February 13 that against the submarine losses, for the first year of ruthless warfare of 6,000,000 tons, the total output in Great Britain had been 1,164,374 tons and in the United States 901,223 tons, or a total of 2,064,697 tons; about one-third of the losses.

An attempt on the part of the opposition in the British Parliament to place the government in an uncomfortable position failed on February 13 by a vote of 159 to 28. Various attempts were made in the Commons to embarrass the government by forcing from Lloyd George more details of the powers of Versailles Supreme War Council than he thought should be given at that time. The Premier replied that the decisions of the council had been unanimously concurred in by the representatives of Allied nations present at the conference and that Sir Douglas Haig and Sir William Robertson were present and were in full agreement with the others as to the military operations to be undertaken. While refusing to state what these plans were the Premier indicated that the armies of all the Allies were to be united against the enemy.

During the past 3 weeks the German submarines have sunk 3 Spanish vessels and have attacked an Italian vessel in Spanish waters. The Spanish government has protested over these violations of her neutrality.

On February 14 Paul Bolo, known as Bolo Pacha, before a court-martial in Paris, was convicted of high treason and sentenced to death.

German torpedo boat destroyers, on the night of February 14, made a raid in the Straits of Dover, overwhelming a patrol fleet of British drifters and trawlers out hunting a submarine which had been sighted. In a 45-minute action one trawler and 7 drifters were sunk.

"King Alcohol Dethroned"

By

DR. FERDINAND C. IGLEHART

DR. IGLEHART'S book tells the whole story of the nation's revolt against Drink, from the beginning up to the present time. It is a masterly presentation, so complete in every detail that it is equivalent to a whole library on the subject. He has enlisted the aid of the men who are foremost today in all the sciences, and in every leading line of business, in setting forth the successive steps through which our nation is becoming emancipated from strong drink. There is hardly an American of prominence in any line of activity, hardly a name that carries weight in legislation or on the public platform, nor yet a single writer of ability in dealing with the subject, who has not made personal contributions to this wonderful book.

Here is what Ex-President Theodore Roosevelt and William Jennings Bryan have to say about "King Alcohol Dethroned":

From Theodore Roosevelt

My dear Dr. Iglehart:

I thank you for the copy of "King Alcohol Dethroned" and appreciate your sending it to me. I wish to congratulate you on what has happened in Congress and the success that is crowning your long fight against alcoholism. The American saloon has been one of the most mischievous elements in American social, political and industrial life. No man has warred more valiantly against it than you have, and I am glad that it has been my privilege to stand with you in the contest.

Faithfully yours,
Theodore Roosevelt.

From William Jennings Bryan

My dear Dr. Iglehart:

I write to thank you for the great service you have rendered the cause of temperance and prohibition in giving to the public the results of your experience and observation in your book entitled "King Alcohol Dethroned." It comes out just at the right time to aid in securing the ratification of the amendment recently submitted. It deserves, and doubtless will have, a large sale. And what joy you must feel in the certainty of an early victory for the reform for which you have toiled so long and so faithfully. You have been a pioneer in the greatest moral movement of this generation, and, having endured the pioneer's sacrifices, no one will begrudge you the pioneer's reward. I congratulate you upon having lived to join in the shouts of triumph and to receive the credit due you for foresight and courage. I am,

Very truly yours,
W. J. Bryan.

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Established 1879

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp. The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights."

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers. For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

GEIKIE'S GREATEST WORK

This great feast of charming, fascinating exposition of the sacred word, than which there is nothing more delightful and instructive in all literature. 10 Volumes delivered prepaid for $10.00

A superbly bound, copiously illustrated edition of ten volumes is ready and is offered while it lasts, at one-third less than the original price, and complete satisfaction is guaranteed.

A fortunate and timely arrangement with the heirs of this prince of expounders of Bible truth enables us to offer this library for the devout, earnest, and reverent student of the Holy Word, at a price far below the figure at which the great work was published.

Dr. Geikie has enriched these volumes with knowledge gathered through wide reading and study and also through information obtained first hand—having traveled in Egypt, Syria, and throughout every nook and corner of the Holy Land. His graphic explanations enable every teacher, Bible student, and preacher to put the old truths in clear, fresh, and winning form. A delightful series of messages from the Holy Land fascinating as travel pictures.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TIMES says: "It is given to few writers to put themselves into the place of the public in such a way as to supply exactly what it wants in any direction. His easy, graphic style, his wide reading in the related literature, and his reference to the sacred text he is illustrating all help to make Dr. Geikie the popular expositor the English and American public have been waiting for."

There is a charm in every line of these books. Here the preacher may get illuminating, stimulating, and practical exposition on the Scriptures. There is a wealth of Scriptural elucidation and suggestive thought upon thousands of helpful themes. You will keep these books at your elbow on your study desk. They will be among the most important of your working tools. Add them at once to your equipment.

To owners of Geikie's New Testament Series (4 vols.)
In order to complete this wonderful set you may now order the six other volumes (Old Testament Series), thereby possessing a veritable library of the choicest work of this charming, Christian writer, at the special price $7.00 Delivered Prepaid

THE EXPOSITOR'S DICTIONARY OF TEXTS

Edited by SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL and endorsed by the World's Great Preachers

This Stupendous Work
In two massive volumes, like two big dictionaries with nearly 2,200 pages, provides expositions on texts, each a compact sermon in itself. It is equal to about thirty ordinary homiletic volumes.

Its Purpose
Is to gather up on every important text in both Old and New Testaments, the best of expositions that have been written by the leading international authorities of the past fifty years, and to condense them into a compass compatible with its literary excellence.

Thousands of Contributors
In compiling the material for this marvelously useful reference work—encyclopedia in its completeness, not one mind, but hundreds of authorities have been consulted and are quoted. Every shade of meaning in every text is suggested. The clergyman does not live who, with this splendid work, will not teach and preach with increased confidence, more intimate knowledge and telling effect.

"By its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review."—Rev. David Smith, D. D.

A First Payment of $1
10 days' examination at our expense proves its indispensable value to you. And another dollar each month for nine months and the books are yours.

THIS year, owing to the scarcity of labor, many housekeepers will have to do the house-cleaning without assistance. Let Ivory Soap be your chief dependence and you will come through with a splendidly clean home to your credit and without any reddening and roughening of the hands to remind you of the ordeal.

Ivory makes such a thick, lasting suds that it cleans faultlessly the carpets, wood-work, furniture, and other badly soiled things which perhaps are given attention only at house-cleaning time.

It is so harmless that it enables even the amateur housekeeper to restore to their original beauty the many perishable articles such as fine bric-a-brac and delicate hangings that cannot be entrusted to ordinary cleaning methods.

It is so mild that it can be used all day long without affecting the whiteness or softness of the tenderest skin.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

The Venice of peace times, one of the streets which you do not have to navigate VENICE, I believe, has been saved. Every day that passes renders it less likely that the Germans and Austrians will reach it, so that our hope of its security is daily strengthened. But a few weeks ago things looked differently. Then the Germans, on the left bank of the Piave River, near where it falls into the Adriatic, were within twelve miles of the city. As their big guns carry thirty miles, they might have "held up" Venice; but providentially they had no big guns there. Still, the danger of invasion seemed so imminent that the admiral in command (for Venice is under naval, not military authority) thought it well to order the evacuation of the city.

We British and Americans were first asked to leave for places of safety. Then a census was taken of the Italian population, so that boat and railway accommodation might be provided for them, and all panic and confusion avoided. As two-thirds of the population could not afford to pay railway fares, at their present high rate, free passes had to be provided for them; besides which, as a large proportion of these could not afford to live out of Venice, lodgings and food had to be secured also. Finally all things were arranged, and in the course of little over a week, 100,000 had gone—many poor people by boat to Ancona, Rimini, and other places on the Adriatic coast, and others to Genoa, Florence, Rome, and winter resorts on the Riviera.

SHOPS were then closed. Banks and insurance offices removed their valuables and archives to other cities, where they had branch establishments. The Caffé Florian, which all travelers know, in the Piazza San Marco, closed its doors, which had been open Sunday and Saturday for a hundred years!

Then the authorities had to think of the public monuments. The Minister of Public Instruction was communicated with, who at once sent experts to advise and assist. First attention was directed to St. Mark's Horses—as Sammel Rogers calls them

"The four steeds divine,
That strike the ground, resounding with their feet,
And from their nostrils snort etherial fire."

When Italy declared war on Austria in May, 1915, they were taken down from the terrace above the main portal of St. Mark's Church, and stabled under an arch on the ground floor of the Ducal Palace. But now, this would not obviate their being carried off to Vienna or Berlin, should the Huns reach Venice, just as Napoleon carried them off to Paris in 1797. Accordingly, they were removed from the Doge's Palace, put on board a war-ship and taken to Ancona. There they were unshipped, conveyed to the railway station, and sent off to Rome, where they arrived safely a few days ago. In Rome they have found a quiet and secure resting-place in the old Castle of St. Angelo, across the Tiber, where it is to be hoped they will remain until victory crowns the efforts of the Allies and peace returns to the world, when they will make a return journey to Venice.

PERHAPS I may here be allowed to rectify a very prevalent error in regard to "St. Mark's Horses." They are generally spoken of as made of bronze, and if so, they must have been cast. But there is no bronze about them and they were not cast. They are made of the finest copper, and were beaten out—by hand in sections. I have often traced and pointed out to American travelers the zig-zag joinings of the pieces. Of course, these were at one time invis-ble; for the horses were covered with a thick coating of pure gold. But that has gone, to a large extent, having been scraped off by French and Austrian soldiers.

ANOTHER statue that has been conveyed by sea and land safely to Rome is the great equestrian one of the famous General Colleoni, which stood on its lofty pedestal in the Campo of S. S. Giovanni e Paolo. Ruskin says of it: "I do not believe there is a more glorious work of sculpture existing in the world." This statue is, of course, of bronze, and was modelled by the Florentine sculptor and painter Andrea Verrocchio in 1481, assisted by his more famous pupil, Leonardo da Vinci. After Verrocchio's death, it was cast in bronze by Leopardi. There is a story told to the effect that when Leopardi had finished his work, he quarrelled with the republic over it. As he could not come to a settlement he knocked off the horse's head and escaped to Florence. The republic ordered him to return, but he refused, saying: "I have knocked off the horse's head, it is true, but I can put it on again; but if I come to Venice and you take off my head, you could not put it on again." The republic forgave him, assured him of his life and reward, and he returned and finished his work. Other monuments that have been removed are those of King Victor Emmanuel on the Riva dei Schiavoni, and of Fra Paolo Sarpi, in Campo Foscari. Then the bells of San Marco have been taken down from the lofty Campanile and sent off to safety. So also have most of the bells of all the churches throughout the city. I do not speak of the pictures which were in the Belle Arte, and in the different museums and churches, for these were all sent away over a couple of years ago, because of the danger of their destruction from the air.

I HAVE said, in the opening sentence of this letter, that I believe Venice is now safe. Let me now give my reasons for saying so. Venice on three sides, north, south, and east, is surrounded by widespreading, shallow lagoons. Through these wind water-ways (canali) deep enough for big ships to navigate, and which are marked off by groups of thick poles (pali) driven deeply into their banks. But even with these, no ships dare enter without a pilot. Pull up these "pali," as the old republic did when Venice was threatened from the sea—as for example by King Pepin—and no boat could possibly get near the city. Of course, with modern cannon, that would be no defense today; but in the lagoons there are Italian battleships and English monitors, and in the Adriatic ships of all the Allies are keeping watch and ward. The coastline to the north is not far distant, only some twelve miles. Travelers who visit Torcello, the island nearest it, can follow its outline quite easily. But I do not suppose any Americans have ever tried to reach it. They would find it impossible to land. There are miles of marsh, thickly covered with reeds and brushwood. An enemy could never come through it. But that is Venice's northern line of natural defense, which, of course, is strengthened by Italian gunboats and English monitors. These can throw shells twenty and thirty miles landward, and so they have steadily driven the Germans farther away—northward up the left bank of the Piave River, and eastward from it. Besides this, the banks of the Piave have been cut, and the land for miles on either side of the river has been inundated. This was rendered possible by the fact that these rivers—the Piave, Sile and Tagliamento—as they flow across the Venetian plains, are not in beds below the level of the surrounding land, far less in ravines, but, owing to the amount of debris they bring down from the Dolomites, their beds have been raised ten, twenty, thirty and even forty feet above the level of the fields by their banks. Enormously broad, high banks of stone and soil keep the water in its place. The difficulty is not to inundate the country, but to prevent it from being inundated! I have seen boats slung from tree branches, to be used by the peasants in the event of the rivers bursting their banks in times of flood, which they too often do.

THE one chance that the enemy has to reach Venice is by Mestre, from the west. That is what they hoped to do. Indeed, they were so sure of effecting this, that the Kaiser granted the request of the Sultan, that he should fly the Crescent from the top of St. Mark's Campanile on Christmas Day! Christmas Day is long past, and not only are they not nearer this goal, but they are farther from it. The defenses to the west of the city are unusually strong. English, French and Italian troops are there, vigilant and courageous. We feel our fear rebuked by Isaiah's words: "Who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man which shall be as grass; and forgettest the Lord thy Maker, and hast feared every day because of the fury of the oppressor, as if he were ready to destroy? And where is the fury of the oppressor?" Our confidence is "the Lord will keep the city," that he will put "his hook in the nose of our enemy, and his bridle in his lips, and turn him back by the way by which he came."

Caring for Venice's Refugees

PAUL U. KELLOGG, in the Survey, gives a description of the work of the American Red Cross in helping to engineer an organized evacuation from Venice. This opportunity had been seized for the American Red Cross by the American consul, B. Harvey Carroll. "Early in November," he writes, "the Red Cross headquarters in Rome had dispatched him 65,000 lire, and he had drawn on it to help refugees reaching Venice from the invaded districts to the north; to keep going, under the American flag, a comfort station at Mestre, a junction point on the mainland, which had reached the last of its resources and through which refugees and exhausted and wounded soldiers were passing in a stream; also to open an American Red Cross comfort station at Chioggia, where the Venetian refugees were boarding the trains; and, more especially, through three gifts of ten thousand lire each, to assist in transplanting the organized work of institutions which in the many months of war had provided employment for the unemployed. . . . With Red Cross funds he had gotten together supplies and manned the canteen, with his two consulate assistants.

"At first they had to buy piecemeal ten loaves of bread here, ten there, and canned foods. But the market was easier in Venice, because so many people had gone; he had secured authorization to buy wholesale, and now wanted to organize buying for storage for any emergency and for use in the further evacuation. The canteen had been able to provide meals at a cost of one lire per person—less than fifteen cents. It provided hot coffee to the grown people and hot milk for the babies; hot soup, bread and meat or bread and cheese, with a few special delicacies for invalids. Each family was given a bag to put goods in, and these were carted from the boats to the cars. There they were turned over to the owners, who looked after them on the long trip, for so congested was the travel that sometimes two or four days were spent in getting down the coast. In this way, 8,000 people had been transported in the last ten days, and the American Red Cross canteen had fed as many as two thousand in twenty-four hours and provided food for them en route. . . . We left with Consul Carroll the sum of 200,000 lire for supplies and assistance to the migrating Venetian groups.

"Next we went, by many turnings, past closed shops and along calli with but few passersby, to the Teatro la Fenice, where the Comitato Civile had its headquarters. Here the people came for the tickets that would get them transportation, or food if they were to remain. We passed through a knot of black-shawled women clogging the little alleyway, and a guard of soldiers was drawn up in the open space at the entrance. Women, old men and children were waiting their turn on the stairs or in the corridors.

"The first work of the committee was for soldiers' families, but it soon broadened out along many lines. It helped float the loan in Venice with one hand, and carried on a sanitary campaign with the other. It had raised something like 3,000,000 lire from voluntary contributions to carry on general civilian relief and provide work.

"The well-to-do people of Venice are not industrialists who make their money, but people who inherit from old families. These had decreased rents and otherwise helped out during the war poverty, but with this class largely gone, little was coming in now to tide the committee over their great emergency. It was maintaining ten popular kitchens. Eight days before, it had been giving fifty thousand rations; today, so swift had come the need, it had given twenty; and altogether, through free distributions and economic sales, it was providing for 15,000 families, or 60,000 people.

"So it had come about, in the present emergency, that the committee had broadened its work once more and taken up the responsibility of functioning in connection with the evacuation of the city."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has asked for another series of articles on Prophecy, which I am glad to furnish, and with gratitude to God that the preceding ones found so wide a reading and that their ministry was blessed. Naturally they gave rise to questions, some of which the editors forwarded to me and which I will try to answer in this and the following article before launching further into the new series.

A number of the questions revealed unfamiliarity with the Bible, especially when we reflect upon the efforts of the last half century or more to extend its study in the Sunday schools. Indirectly they impressed one with the great need of a weekly periodical like the Christian Herald going into many homes, and the great responsibility upon its management to see that its readers get "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

A few of the questions were not really questions but just expressions of dissent from some of the views presented. For example: that the Jewish nation would be rehabilitated in Palestine proved a surprise to some, and even intelligent and educated people were found capable of so reading the Bible on that subject as to make it teach the very opposite to the truth. This may be discussed again more at length in a later article, as the successes of British arms in that quarter of the world, and especially the capture of Jerusalem, make it a very live subject just now.

However, a moment is taken at this point to answer a single question upon it. One inquirer asked, evidently in no contentious spirit and with a serious intent, "Who are meant by them that had fallen down that Jesus will come again to raise up?" The reference is to Acts 15: 16, and the teaching there is that "the tabernacle of David" is in mind, or in other words, the kingdom over which David reigned. This kingdom, which is the kingdom of Israel, has fallen down; it has gone out of existence for the time being; but when Jesus comes again its ruins will be repaired and it will be set up on the earth once more. In that day Israel will become the great missionary nation to other peoples, and through her testimony "the residue of men" (i. e. the Gentiles) will "seek after the Lord." Read the whole chapter down to verse 18.

Questions on Prophecy Answered

ANOTHER theme whose treatment brought unhappiness to some was that of the apostasy and the Antichrist. That Babylon means the papacy and that the man of sin is the Pope, is one of the beliefs of the Reformation period that is still held by not a few with more tenacity even than the doctrine of justification by faith itself. There was good reason for the Reformers feeling keenly on that subject, and good excuse for their misunderstanding the Scriptures concerning it; but history, to say nothing of Sacred Writ, has proved them to be wrong. We know how erroneous is the teaching of Roman Catholicism as compared with the Bible and how soul-destroying it is. And we know also that the character and conduct of its hierarchy in many places closely resembles what the Bible teaches about Antichristianity and the Antichrist. But to closely resemble a thing is not the same as being the thing itself.

In the fulfilment of prophecy three-fourths of the evidence is not enough. To reach a conclusion on that basis breeds all sorts of confusion. The prophecy must be fulfilled completely, if God's Word shall be honored and our faith sustained. We do not hesitate to say that Roman Catholicism is a daughter of Babylon whose features resemble her mother's very closely, but still the daughter and the mother are not identical.

AN exception is made here in order to discuss one of the letters we have received on this subject. It is a little longer than most, but in other respects quite typical. The correspondent refers to the Pope's assumption to be the "vicar of Christ," and says, "his assertion is Antichrist." Of course he does not mean just that, because it would negative his contention. The Antichrist, whoever he may be, is a person and not an "assertion" merely. But what the correspondent means is that such an assertion on the Pope's part is anti-Christian, with which we fully agree. Indeed, the whole system of Roman Catholicism is anti-Christian, and as such it is one of the contributing elements, and a strong one, in creating a political and religious situation favorable to the rise of the Antichrist; but this is different from saying that the Pope himself is that person. At another place in his letter the correspondent quotes Paul as saying that "this whole popery is an untruth, a lie, hence is Antichrist." But he does not mean just that

Ourselves as South Americans See Us

By CLAYTON
SEDGWICK COOPER

"IN temperament and traditions North and South America are worlds apart," said a keen Brazilian in answer to my question as to the differences between the Latin Americans and the inhabitants of the United States. In these days, when the two Americas are being brought inevitably closer to each other in trade and political matters, when the new routes of communication for travelers and the new alignments consequent upon war conditions are being cemented, it is important for both parts of the Western Hemisphere to give thought to those mental and spiritual understandings without which it is certain there can be no lasting international cooperation.

He who travels widely in the Latin American countries today and meets the keen, cultured, alert men and women who stand for the leadership of state, of society and thought in these regions, is soon impressed with at least two convictions: first, that we here in the United States have often made the mistake of thinking of these people as connected only with revolutions and the red-hot tropics; and second, that by reason of their traditional emphasis upon literary, legal and artistic pursuits inherited largely from European sources, the Latin Americans are fitted to teach us something. They can show us a quality of courtesy and consideration of the feelings of others. They have produced some of the best jurists and diplomats of this hemisphere. Their home life and their love of children, their care for their dependents, their hospitality, and their devotion to the beautiful, whether in the love for flowers and dress, or in the construction of business houses and palatial homes, are all matters which we of the more practical, efficient North may study with benefit to ourselves. These people emphasize friendship to such an extent that it is difficult to do business in Latin America without friends. As it is often stated, "If the South American really likes you, your success is certain." He will sacrifice in a financial way in order to do business with a man whom he likes, that is, a man who is willing to understand his ways, who is not rude or crude, and who mixes politeness with his trading ability.

ONE typical Latin American of the higher class stated thus to me his idea of the difference between themselves and us: "We are Latins in our likes and ambitions; you are Anglo-Saxons. There is a distinct difference in the attack upon the same problem—the problem of life. You like to work along practical lines, and you make business of first importance; even your homes, your pleasures and your mental and spiritual satisfactions come secondary. We here in South America, by reason partly of climate and inheritances from our forefathers in Spain and Portugal, do not lay stress on working as you do. Industries do not come as naturally to us. Letters and politics are easily accepted by our temperament. We like to get the most possible out of life in connection with our pleasures and our friends. In other words, you live to work, while we work in order to live."

We Americans may not altogether agree with this analysis of the situation, but it is doubtless the attitude of many thoughtful men in the republics south of us. These look upon the United States as a tremendous business and industrial country. It is to them a new country. If they want modern machinery or other modern utilities, they turn to us. But when they wish to spend a holiday, or wish models for clothes, or social usages, or books, or languages, they turn to Europe, the great capitals of Paris, Vienna, Rome, Madrid or Lisbon. In each one of these old centers they are at home in the language and in the customs, and the inhabitants cater to the Latin Americans far more carefully than we have been accustomed to do in the United States.

The samples of commercial agents which we have sent to Latin America at times have also led these Southerners to have little respect for our gentlemanhood, upon which they lay great stress. Our sailors in the past have acted strangely and boisterously in their harbors and port cities; the government agents whom we have sent to these republics in the past have not been chosen always with discrimination; in some cases they have not commended to the South Americans either our manners or our morals. Our lack of attention to the amenities of life in connection with commercial contacts have made at times an unfortunate impression.

IT is not strange that these antipodal ideas concerning a matter so vital as bread-winning bring misunderstandings. I have talked with scores of business men in South America who have been united at least in this point, namely, that they can not see the value of any man's working or continuing in business after he has earned enough money to make it possible for him to live in any degree of comfort. The Spanish

In religious matters the point of view between the two Americas differs considerably, as their traditions have brought to each a diverse experience. In countries like Peru, Ecuador and Colombia the Roman Catholic faith, which is the religion of virtually all of Latin America, has stronger hold than on the East Coast in the countries of Argentina and Brazil. The priests and the church generally are more influential in politics west of the Andes than east of them, where modern industries and closer contact with present-day world conditions have tended to break up the religious medievalism seen in some Latin American states.

The American Legation at La Paz, Bolivia

American inherits certain of the ancient medieval ideas about the "gentleman," who, like the high-caste Brahman of India, has been intended from the foundation of the world to occupy a special and selected field of leisured competence, while far down below him, with a wide gulf between, is the laborer or common worker, who was created to till the soil and to keep shop, incidentally being ready at all times to wait upon the gentleman.

In countries like Chile, where so many of the old families are living at present upon the nitrate industry, and Argentina, where these same aristocrats subsist by reason of their fortunate possession of wide tracts of the productive pampa, the favored sons have not been obliged to exert themselves even to make a living, and this fact has helped to increase rather than to diminish, among this part of the population, the respect for industry and modern business. These people are quite willing to let the foreigner with his utilitarian ways build and run his railroads, work his mines and inaugurate modern enterprises for the preparation and export of the national products. The South American's interest in this kind of endeavor is limited largely to the amount of money which his agents are able to pass to him on occasion from his investments.

THE Continental Sunday prevails throughout South America, and is a day for outdoor amusements, for family gatherings and holiday making. The women especially cling to the church throughout these countries, while the men are becoming more and more indifferent. American educational missions are doing good work in many places, especially in the two flourishing preparatory schools in Santiago, Chile, in Buenos Aires, and in the famous Mackenzie College of Sao Paulo, Brazil. The latter college gives large attention to engineering as well as to other branches of liberal training, and is one of the best institutions of its kind in all of South America. The Catholic schools, which are attended by the sons and daughters of the higher classes of society in many of the republics, do not have the reputation of training the youth practically, but emphasize religious dogmas and give considerable attention to the literary side and the polite accomplishments of music and art.

Here, again, historical background must be studied to get the point of view of Latin Americans regarding their religion as regarding that of other nations. South America was settled for the most part by men who cared far more for adventure and gold than for the rights of conscience. The Spanish American can hardly understand the New England religious outlook, for his ancestors gave him a very different heritage from the one flowing down from the Puritan settlements. The priests came to the South American countries along with the adventurers and early colonizers, but they came bringing the authoritative religion of the Middle Ages, a faith quite different from that of the individual conviction and Bible reading habits of the New England settlers. The present tendency is to separate church from state in South America, as Brazil and some other republics have done already, and with that separation the hold of the native faith upon the thoughtful men and students especially has diminished in strength.

THERE is in general a widespread ignorance in Latin America regarding the United States and American characteristics—almost as impregnable as that in this country regarding our Southern neighbors.

The newspapers give more attention to European events than to happenings in our northern Republic. The routes of travel have been east and not north, and the trade has gone more generally to Europe until recently, because Europe has catered to the needs and the methods of doing business on the part of South Americans.

Changing attitudes and sentiments are growing out of the enforced conditions consequent on the great war. South American business men are discovering our markets and our schools, and by travel northward are learning to know us better. They are returning home with different ideas of the "Yankee." They are sending students to American colleges in ever greater numbers, and as these return they do much to carry true ideas of the United States. Our treatment of time, our social movements, and the participation of women in public life are strange to these people. They admire our business efficiency, even while they do not care in many cases to copy it. These are a highly sensitive and proud people, taking pride in their own ways of doing things, and conservative of old customs and old friendships.

The present need of the two Americas is for closer personal contact, for more mutual consideration the one of the other, and for reciprocal relations on a basis of human equality.

RUSSIA CRUMBLES

GERMANY did not long permit Trotzky's State of Peace to charm the already befuddled mind of the Russian proletariat. That Russia wanted peace goes without saying. That Lenin and Trotzky promised it is assured—but such a peace! If these two adventurers had been in Germany's pay, as has been freely charged, they could hardly have proven more profitable servants. Destroying first the Russian national will by driving a wedge of class interest into the already widening chasm between the bourgeoisie and the workmen, soldiers and peasants, the Bolsheviks held through each uncertain week the trembling balance of power in the Russia which had abolished authority and which Kerensky had sought in vain to invest with a new national consciousness. Meantime soldiers were sent home, units at the front were encouraged to become friends of the one-time enemy, and the stage being laid, the futile peace discussion at Brest-Litovsk was instituted. Futile indeed was it from the Russian standpoint, for she got no peace although she opened her frontiers to the enemy. Taking full advantage of the opportunity thus offered, Germany dealt with the only portion of the Russians which held a semblance of responsible government, making peace with the Ukrainians. By this move she separated Great and Little Russia and took 28,000,000 people and vast stores of food stuffs out of the reach of Trotzky's filmy jurisdiction. It soon became apparent that the Ukrainians had not only made peace with the Teutonic powers but had become their potential allies, since German and Austrian troops were asked by the Rada to come to its relief against the energetic efforts of the Bolsheviks to overturn its authority. Teutonic troops were sent to the Ukraine and two great armies were set in motion from the former fighting front. One, under General von Eichhorn, moved toward Petrograd and the other, under General von Linsingen, toward the rear of the Bolshevik army attacking the Ukrainians. On February 18 the dispatches showed the Bolsheviks finally triumphant in Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine, following fighting which cost 4,000 lives and left 7,000 wounded on both sides. While the Russians were thus fighting among themselves, the Germans were throwing their troops across the former battle-line on a front of over 400 miles, crossing the Dvina, which had marked the end of the great Russian retreat, taking the town of Dvinsk and driving on toward Petrograd. South of the great Pinsk marsh, they had gone on in the direction of Kovel in Volhynia. In these two advances the Germans met with only the most desultory resistance; a half-hearted attempt was made to blow up the great bridge crossing the Dvina at Dvinsk, but what was left of the Russian army fell back before the Germans with little resistance, the retreating army corps blocking the roads leading back from the front. It was reported on February 19 that Germany's peace terms, which Trotzky had so dramatically rejected, had included the cession of the occupied territory and an indemnity of $4,000,000,000 in gold. Later, it was said that the indemnity demanded was only $1,500,000,000. On the 19th Lenin and Trotzky were reported to have asked Austria by wireless whether she intended to participate in the resumption of active hostilities, and on the same day it was reported that Trotzky and Lenin had agreed to sign the peace treaty along the line demanded by Germany. Taking note of this report, the German authorities, while pressing their troops to further advances, demanded of Trotzky the delivery to some German authority of a signed agreement. With this demand Trotzky was said to have complied, sending a signed surrender by messenger to Dvinsk. Meanwhile the Germans were advancing swiftly, taking the towns and fortresses of Minsk and Rovno in Volhynia and advancing more than 25 miles along the Riga-Petrograd railway, crossing well beyond the former Russian positions. German troops also crossed on the ice to the mainland, opposite the Oesel Islands, marching toward Reval. On February 21 Petrograd was suffering a reign of terror at the hands of marauding bands, Russian Bolshevik troops were withdrawing from Turkish Armenia to attack the Don Cossacks in the rear, while other Bolshevik troops were attacking the Cossacks and the Ukrainians from the north and west. There was a report that General Kaledines, hetman of the Don Cossacks, had committed suicide.

February 21 also brought a report that German cavalry was within 175 miles of Petrograd with practically no opposing forces intervening. The Germans it is difficult to decide whether the order for resistance preceded the decision to submit or whether Trotzky is making peace and fighting invasion simultaneously.

February 23 the Russian wireless dispatches reported that Germany had offered to renew the peace negotiations on the following conditions: Both nations to declare the war ended, the provinces of Russia now occupied by her enemy with some additions eastward to be transferred from the territorial protection of Russia to that of Germany, Germany and Austria-Hungary declaring their purpose to define further the fate of these regions in agreement with their populations, Livonia and Esthonia to be immediately cleared of Russian troops. On the same day Ambassador Francis reported that the Bolsheviks intended to fight and that the legations in case Petrograd were abandoned would follow the provisional government further into Russia.

On February 24 it was announced that Lenin and Trotzky had accepted the German terms and that the conference at Brest-Litovsk would be resumed and a treaty signed. German troops were approaching Reval and were also drawing near Kiev, the Ukrainian capital.

WILL YOU COOPERATE OR OBSTRUCT? This question was the final thrust of a noteworthy telegram which President Wilson sent to the General President of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Mr. Wm. L. Hutcheson, on February 17. In this telegram the President called the attention of Mr. Hutcheson to the fact that the strike of the carpenters in the shipyards was "in marked and ferences with Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board, Mr. Hutcheson, however, evidenced a tendency to continue to insist upon the granting of some of the demands of the union, particularly upon the demand for the closed shop; a demand which the government absolutely refused to consider.

The Department of Labor on February 17 announced the personnel of the joint conference of employers and union leaders who will be expected to lay down the bases of the relations between capital and labor during the war. The first session of the conference was set for February 25 at the office of Secretary of Labor Wilson. The employers' representatives were: Loyal A. Osborne, president of the Westinghouse Electrical and Mfg. Co.; Chas. F. Brooker, of an Engineering Co.; L. P. Loree, of the Delaware & Hudson Co.; C. Edwin Michael, of Va. Bridge and Iron Co. The workers' representatives were: Frank J. Hayes, president of the United Mine Workers of America; Wm. L. Hutcheson, of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America; J. H. Franklin, of the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Shipbuilders; Victor Olander, representative of the International Seamen's Union; T. A. Rickert, president of the United Garment Workers of America.

It was announced on the twentieth that since February 1st shipping available for allied requirements had been increasing, due in part to anti-submarine successes, to rerouting of ships and to new construction. It was stated that with shipyards working at full capacity the total of available tonnage would rise steadily.

NEWFOUNDLAND LINER ASHORE. The liner Florizel, operated by the Red Cross Line between St. John's, Newfoundland, and Halifax and New York, ran on the rocks at Red Cove on the Newfoundland coast, 20 miles north of Cape Race, just before daylight on February 24. The ship had apparently lost her bearings in a blizzard which drove her off her course. Mountainous seas prevented rescue work until the following day, when, although the bow was slightly above water, a fire was shot over the hulk. Later it was reported 42 were saved. The ship carried 78 passengers and a crew of 69.

AMERICAN BATTLEPLANES TO FRANCE. Secretary of War Baker on February 20 revealed the fact that, although shipments had been scheduled to begin in July, the first consignment of American battleplanes equipped with twelve-cylinder Liberty motors was already on the way to France. The Secretary stated that 2,500 planes ready to take the air at one time was the greatest number that had been available to either side in the war as yet. He further stated that for every machine in the air it was necessary to have two in

The Business of Making Christians

By EDWARD S. BABCOX, an Ohio Layman and a Leader Among Advertising Men

BEING a church member, more or less active, I am interested in Christian work in all its departments.

Because I am a business man, I see our great commercial world as a swiftly revolving dynamo, creating and storing up energy for itself all the time. The business world, as a unit, is characterized by a splendid poise which results from its prosperity and confidence. If, somehow, we can switch off into the veins of our church body, some of the pulsing, vibrant force which builds business, it could not help but do good.

Now the Church—speaking generically—is here to perpetuate the teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Church is to religion what our shoe factories are to the great shoe industry in Rochester—the visible, tangible evidence of activity. Many churches in their present activity—or lack of activity—remind one of a corps of musicians organized into an orchestra—Pryor's Band, for example. Those men are musicians, not business men. So every organization of this kind needs and has a business manager to schedule its tours, make its plans, and show a profit at the end of the year. It is not sufficient that they be good professional artists. There is another important link in the chain which is needed.

Now, most churches are well organized on their evangelical side. Our ministers are good men and they preach good sermons. We have many societies in the churches, all apparently doing their share. Sunday schools, missionary societies, Christian Endeavor, and all the rest are busy. But just what are they accomplishing? That's the question.

As I have observed and studied the church situation during the last few years, it seems to me that the chief need is for a definite conception of the business of the modern church, and then the application of tried and tested business principles to accomplish that end.

In all reverence, therefore, I say that today the active modern church recognizes that it is in business—real business, big business.

A growing pastor of such a church was on a train one day, and finding himself seated beside a fellow passenger, he said, "What's your business?" His traveling companion replied, "I am a salesman. I sell typewriters. Here's my catalogue. By the way, what's your business?" The pastor replied thoughtfully, "Why, I am a salesman, too. Here's my catalogue." He handed his companion his Bible.

LOOKED at as a business proposition, the Church is trying to do just what all business organizations are trying to do—to create business for itself, i. e., to make Christian people. Boiled down, that's the essence of all church activity—to make Christians. Beside the task of Christianizing the world, all its other duties fade into the shadows.

All right, then. We agree that the Church's business today is to make something—create something—which did not exist before—Christians.

Did you ever stop to think who is the one great Creator? Well, one night I was reading at home—just browsing through a number of books looking for some mental meat—and I opened the Bible. I read in various places, and finally turned to Genesis, chapter 1, verses 1-5, and there I found a masterpiece on business, because those five verses deal with the rudiments—the heart and soul of all business, whether it be making typewriters or making Christians. In those verses you read that, after the Lord made the world, he made light. Why did he do that? Our modern interpretation tells us that light means understanding, knowledge, information. Therefore the Lord spread understanding and knowledge when he made light. He made it easy for the people who were to populate the world to see and understand some of the great vital problems which they must solve.

That's the keynote of all productive business—light, understanding.

People who don't go to church, people who are not Christians, simply do not understand the Church. They are in the dark and need light. If they did understand the Church and its object in the world, they would support it and attend it, because that's the only reasonable, rational thing they could do. But what are you and I doing to reach these people who do not understand? Getting back to our business again, what are we doing to reach the people who are not customers of the Church?

But, you say, "We do a lot for the people who do come to church." Of course we do. But those who stay without—the sheep outside the fold—those are the people we must reach.

Stripping the Church of its trappings, and getting down to bed-rock and brass tacks, we must conclude that it has a product to sell and a price to get. It's a quality product and its price is not. There is no discount. A man must believe and have faith; he must abjure selfishness and self-interest. He must love his neighbor as himself, to be saved and to be a true Christian. That's the price he must pay for the product which the Church and Christianity offers—salvation.

That seems very reasonable, you say; but the great question now is, how are you going to put your selling campaign into effect?

We are agreed that the modern church must be a business organization. It has (in a high and reverent sense) a product to sell. It asks a high price. Now how shall we market such a commodity?

Well, we are right in the position of the modern sales manager who has a big factory turning out goods on the one hand, and a big public to which he might sell the goods, on the other. The sales manager knows that the public won't buy the goods of their own accord, as a rule. Now, science and psychology tell us that in selling, our process divides itself into five logical steps. If you were to sell me a piano, for instance, you would have to do five things:

1. Get my attention.
2. Arouse my interest.
3. Stir up my desire.
4. Convince me that I needed the piano.
5. Get me to sign the order—action.

That's the science of salesmanship.

WHEN we try to make a Christian of a man who is not a Christian, let's be logical. Suppose you know a man who ought to join your church and be a good strong worker. Don't go at him and say, "Come on, Frank, and join our church. There's a lot of fine people over there, and you ought to be one of us. We need you and you need us, so come over next Sunday and join."

Don't you see that in doing that—and many of us have done it—we are trying to get action before you have gotten a man's interest or aroused any desire on his part to join your church? You must first show him why it would be to his advantage to take the action you suggest. You must show him not only what he can do for the church, but what the church and Christian fellowship will do for him.

Look at the foreign missionaries who build hospitals, schools, factories, etc., before they attempt very much along the lines of real Christianizing work. Those hospitals and schools interest, excite and convince the heathen that the Christian force behind them must be good. When they see their sick healed and their ignorant taught, they are all ready for the final action which comes in any selling process. A rousing sermon, or close personal work gets this action and the result is conversion.

Our foreign missionaries, in this respect, are better salesmen of Christianity than some of us at home.

Every good salesman recognizes his competition. There is little time to dwell on it here, but it would pay each of you to get a copy of the Saturday Evening Post of February 1, 1913, and read James H. Collins's article entitled "The Business Side of the Church." There you will see how saloons, lodges, labor organizations, etc., attract, interest and hold their men. The price is cheaper. They extract no self-sacrifice, but offer rather a satisfaction of physical appetite, fellowship with their kind, and do not attempt any raising of moral standards.

Don't ignore your competition when you are seeking members and workers for your church and C. E. Society. Remember that a fly likes honey better than vinegar, better even than water. If you are going to get men away from the places I have mentioned, you have got to offer something more attractive, more interesting, and you have got to convince them that it will be to their advantage to attend.

NOW, hastily to crystallize all this into a workable plan which can be put into operation in your own C. E. Society or church.

The first thing to do is to put little cards, with space for name and address, into your pews before every service. Print a paragraph on the card something like this:

If you haven't attended this church before, and would like to get in touch with some of its officers and members, and learn more about us and our work, please sign your name and address below. If you have no other church home, you are welcome here.

Whenever a card of that kind is signed, that's your nibble—your prospect. Follow it with a call. See that that person is called upon within a week if possible, either by the pastor or some active member. Make sure that every person who attends your church or society gets a kindly reception and a real demonstration of some of the spirit of fellowship we preach about. Some churches are not unlike refrigerators.

Organize some way to get a line on the new-comers in your parish. If a business man moves from city to city, he is very soon approached by various clubs and business organizations, which invite him to attend meetings here and there, get acquainted, or take a hand in the activities. Lodges do this. Some saloons cultivate their "prospects" pretty carefully. But so far as I know, most of our churches devote their energies to calling on people who are already members.

Another way of keeping in touch with members and non-members is the church bulletin or magazine. Such a publication can do for its church what the modern house organ or business magazine does for a business organization, provided it is well edited, filled with strong, virile articles, and appeals to people as it should.

Now, advertising is a selling force—a great force in business. Think a moment. "Unedda"—"Kodak"—"Sapolio"—all words made by advertising. It has cost millions of dollars to make "Unedda" mean to you and me "Freshly baked crackers in a moisture-proof, air tight package." Each of those names is a copyrighted trademark and stands for a familiar product, simply because millions of people have been taught their significance. They understand them.

Advertising is a great civilizing force. It is a salesman with enough assistants to call on all his prospects at once. Thousands of the brightest men of this country are engaged in the various phases of advertising work. Over $600,000,000 was spent in advertising during 1917.

JUST one example of what advertising has done in Rochester, N. Y., for a great cause which stands as close to church work, religion and Christianity.

About twenty-five years ago, a small house was secured at Charlotte, near Rochester, N. Y., and a few sick babies were taken there during the summer, to get away from the torrid heat of the city. A few people knew about it, and these few and their friends supported this beginning of the Infants' Summer Hospital. The work continued each summer for twenty years or more, and four or five years ago the Rochester Ad Club, learning of it, espoused the cause and gave an entertainment, raising about $2,000 for the babies. The same thing was done the next year.

But one summer the directors of the hospital invited the Ad Club to a luncheon at Charlotte, and while there the members were shown through the hospital, and saw the great work which was being done. It was pointed out that the buildings were in bad shape, and that unless new buildings were constructed during the winter, there would be no Infants' Summer Hospital the next summer. Because of lack of heating facilities, many babies could not be kept warm during a cold summer. Tiny tots, almost skeletons, some of them lying quiet and still in their little white cribs, were pointed out to the men, and of one of them the nurses explained that "this little fellow wasn't expected to live day before yesterday, but a physician brought him down in an automobile, and the cool lake breezes and pure milk are going to make him well."

Incidents of this kind touched the hearts of the Ad men. The entire club was swept right off its feet by the dire need for immediate action which was made clear to us by the hospital officers.

So the club immediately undertook the job of raising $100,000 for the Infants' Summer Hospital, opened up the Babies' Bank on Main Street, started advertising in the newspapers, street cars and elsewhere, and the amount was raised.

Now, if advertising and selling and sound business management can do more in three months toward popularizing the Infants' Summer Hospital in Rochester than was done without these factors in twenty-five years; if these methods can build up giant corporations and make coined words so well known that they find their way into our dictionaries, why cannot these forces be utilized in the business of making Christians?

If I read the signs aright, the day is not far distant when we shall see a number of churches using at least a page a week. One-half that page will be devoted to sound logic and argument written by representative pastors about Christianity and the Church, and the other half will be devoted to regular church notices of the different denominations.

It seems to me that this fire has long been kindled. It is simply a question now which church, which pastor, will take the initiative, create interest, apply the match, and thus carry the blessings and good news of the Gospel to thousands and thousands of men and women who will never be reached in any other way.

One of our Akron pastors tells how he preaches to thousands each day. He has a small electric illuminated bulletin board, about 3 x 7, on the church lawn. Passersby read his sentence sermons, which he culls from many sources. At night the bulletin board is lighted. Cars stop there and many people enjoy and profit by his enterprise.

He believes in reverent, sensible advertising. When all pastors do, the church will have more customers. Hundreds of advertising men all over America are ready to help.

Christian Service

THERE should be no such thing in reality as an idle Christian. God has something for each of us to do, if we are truly His. He needs helpers and He loves to be helped. There are those who, through age, inexperience, or inadequate preparation, or for some other reason, consider themselves unfit for any kind of effort to win souls; yet there are precedents aplenty which would help them to an opposite conclusion. Dr. C. A. Blanchard tells of an old lady of fifty, quite deaf, who determined to become a missionary; and she did, and her work was blest in the inbringing of many souls to Christ. Bella Cooke, fifty years bedridden, was the messenger of salvation to many to whom her sick-room became a sanctuary.

Perhaps it may be said that these are exceptional cases; but to the willing and ready heart God calls again and again, and insistence brings recognition and compliance. Some of those who became spiritual leaders and prophets were called more than once. Moses heard the call twice before yielding. Jonah, too, heard it and needed to be disciplined before he gave willing obedience. It is true, these were for service on a large scale; but all whose souls have been lighted and liberated by the Gospel are due to do some service, no matter how humble or small. It is a draft in which there are no exemptions—all are liable to Christian service. And the first step in that service opens up to the worker a new view of life and its beautiful significance and possibilities.

Great men and women for great tasks, and it is altogether right that the worker should be efficient; but the same power which gave a tongue to Moses when he pleaded that he lacked eloquence gave him also a full spiritual equipment and control of his temper. "I will be with thy mouth and teach thee what thou shalt speak," was the clear promise, and the same pledge has been realized in the case of thousands of humble Christian workers, who were without special gifts until they became spirit-filled. God never fails to equip those who undertake for service wholeheartedly. It may be on simple lines that they have to labor, and among plain folk; but whatever their station, they are made equal to its needs. Where special training is desirable, the way is always opened. One by one, difficulties are removed until the moment comes when the worker faces his task in readiness for it.

There are thousands of God's people in this land today who are rendering service of which the outer world knows little or nothing. Yet it is a service pleasing in His sight who knows the sincerity of the hearts of those who serve. Their field may be in the home, or in the narrow circle of their acquaintance, where the seed of truth is sown as opportunity offers. The simplest may have a share in such a ministry as this, where kindness, gentleness, and a deep and sincere trust in divine leading are in evidence and shed an unconscious influence on others. We grow to larger things through experience, some slowly, others more rapidly. There are many aids available to facilitate spiritual growth and efficiency. There are Christian training schools and institutes where equipment can be had for every grade of worker. Contact with Christian veterans in the service is also available and from such the novice is always sure of a welcome and of helpful cooperation.

The Power of Unity

IN the course of his fiery eloquence, Evangelist Billy Sunday frequently says certain things that dig deep into the consciousness of the average thinking man and stick there. Speaking in Dr. Burrell's famous pulpit in the Marble Collegiate Church the other day, the evangelist discussed "Modern Religion" in its various forms, and especially "liberal" religion, which he regarded as an anomaly in a world where sin and its tragic consequences remain unchanged. Then he suddenly struck a powerful chord. People, he said, were asking, "Why don't you preachers get together? There are too many different brands of religion. You preachers haven't any business sense," to all of which he retorted happily enough, though hardly to the point.

We wonder what kind of a sermon Mr. Sunday would preach if he took Dr. Carroll's church statistics, published lately in the Christian Herald—showing the existence of no less than 167 different religious denominations and branches of denominations in the United States—as his theme, and the Master's conception of His church in John 10:16 as the text.

There is strength in numbers only when united, whereas division is always weakness. An army has many brigades, battalions, and regiments, each with its own leaders; yet at the order to advance it operates as a single unit. If each division chose its own time and direction and objective, the forward movement would end in confusion and disaster. The Church must learn the lesson of unity, if it is to undertake the great work that lies before it. When Mr. Sunday goes to the front "somewhere in France," he may bring back as the result of his observations some practical views on fighting the forces of sin with a united Christianity.

Preventable Fires

THE chief causes of destructive fires are ignorance and carelessness. Of the more than $200,000,000 annual fire loss in this country, more than three-fourths is preventable or partly preventable. Figures compiled by the National Board of Underwriters confirm this ratio year after year. Of the preventable causes of fires the first in destructiveness is defective chimneys and flues, the second is improper care of stoves and furnaces, and the third is cigarettes, cigars and pipes. Among the other common preventable causes are hot ashes, matches, open lights, rubbish and litter. These accumulate a loss of $60,000,000 a year, of which every dollar could have been and should have been saved.

The matter is of such grave national moment, particularly at this time of strict conservation, that President Wilson has felt called upon to say: "Preventable fire is more than a private misfortune. It is a public dereliction. At a time like this, of emergency and of manifest necessity for the conservation of national resources, it is more than ever a matter of deep and pressing consequence that every means should be taken to prevent this evil."

"The time will surely come when such fires will be recognized as culpable and calling for punishment."

The Great Ideal

SINGLENESSE of aim is the secret of victory. A thousand duties there may be, yet one single ambition wins the prize, just as focusing the rays of the sun brings the power. The concentration of forces at a given point decides the destiny of armies. A single individual absorbed by one high ideal has changed the face of the world. Livingstone exclaimed "This one thing I do! I will open the door of a great future for Africa." Morrison did the same for China; Judson for Burma; Luther for Protestantism. Great discoverers have been equally men of one purpose. To do one thing completely is to do all things. Put your foot upon the first rung of the ladder and never stop climbing.

Europe is beginning to understand the attitude of America in the war. Statesmen, as well as the common people, are being impressed with the ideal which this nation has kept steadily in view. "The American army is entering into action in France," said Albert Thomas, former Minister of Munitions, "and its part will be a growing one. Nevertheless, America has a greater rôle than that of its army. . . . President Wilson can become not only the leader of American democracy, but the leader of a world democracy."

Our nation must present a solid front to win the war. We must be the UNITED STATES—divided we fall. The lukewarm, listless and indifferent impede progress. The fault-finders and critical partisans waste precious time and achieve nothing. Absolute devotion to the ideals of the nation are essential to victory. Our soldier boys have one ruling idea: they know they are going into the path of danger; but they are willing to suffer the loss of all things for the enthronement of liberty throughout the world. It is thus the youth of America are pressing forward toward the mark, to win universal harmony among the nations.

Food Supply as the Farmer Sees It

THROUGH all the lectures, conferences, demonstrations and meetings of special organizations, provided as a part of the annual Farmers' Week program at the New York State College of Agriculture, first of all stood out the all-important subject of food production and food saving. Hardly a meeting or lecture failed to touch upon this subject in some phase or other.

F. D. Wolcott, New York banker and organizer of the relief work in Poland, brought home the urgent need for saving food. "The armies of our allies are well fed," he said, "but the civil populations of England, France, and Italy are tottering on the verge of starvation. The whole world war at present is hanging on a hair, and the food supply is holding it in balance." It is up to the United States, said Mr. Wolcott, to preserve this balance.

Jane Addams, the famous settlement worker of Hull House, Chicago, told of woman's part in the food situation. She said in the past woman has always helped in agriculture and in Europe today she is helping even more than she has in the past.

President Schurman of Cornell scored price-fixing, saying the farmers could hardly be expected to raise bigger crops if they felt there was a possibility a price might be fixed which was below cost of production. "The big part of the food problem is production," he said; "conservation is important, but it won't produce one litter of pigs in all the United States."

State Commissioner of Agriculture C. S. Wilson, formerly a professor in the college, sounded a warning against frenzied farming which might look solely to present production and not to the future. One orchardist, of whom he knew, was considering cutting down his orchard of fifteen years' growth to raise other crops. Fruit is a food, and a needed food, declared Commissioner Wilson, and to destroy such an orchard would be a mistake. "Never before," he said, "have the farmers had as good an understanding of the problems confronting them as now. They have sifted from the quantities of suggestions, good, bad, indifferent, insane and hysterical, some of the good ones and now have a pretty definite plan of action for the coming season."

Another important plan suggested by the State Food Commission during the week is a state-wide drive for a greater use of milk and potatoes. The dairying industry in the state is seriously threatened, it is claimed, unless the great surplus milk can be used and thus prevent the slaughter of the dairy cows.

Preachers' Pensions

IN these days of generous giving to all worthy objects, it is gratifying to note that the general movement among the churches for making adequate provision for the superannuated ministers has been greatly energized. At the meeting of the Interdenominational Secretaries of the Protestant Churches in New York lately the whole subject was very thoroughly discussed.

It was shown that the Protestant churches have in their treasuries, available for preachers' pensions, $33,000,000, and are actively engaged in campaigns which will bring this amount up to $65,000,000, or possibly even more. The Protestant Episcopal Church was the first to complete its campaign, securing $8,500,000; the Methodist Episcopal has $12,000,000 for the same purpose in its treasuries; the Presbyterian Church has $6,539,000 and hopes to bring this up to a total of $10,000,000; the Northern Baptists have $2,000,000 and will try to add another $1,000,000; the Congregationalists have $1,000,000; Methodist Episcopal Church, South, $1,200,000, which it is asking to make $5,000,000; the General Synod of the Lutheran Church is in a campaign for a substantial fund, while various other denominations, including the Presbyterian Church, South, and the Church of Christ, are working energetically on the same line.

It is a fine thing to make provision for the old and faithful ministers. There is no more worthy or deserving body of God's servants this side of heaven. Sadly underpaid as a rule during their active careers, the pastors who have passed the age of active service should be cared for with loving generosity. In this time of liberal giving for so many good causes, we know of none which is more to be commended than the Aged Preachers' Pension Fund. Church members of all denominations have here a duty which should not be neglected. It should be a fixed charge on their resources. Many of these old ministers have spent the better part of a long lifetime in active ministerial service. They have led multitudes to Christ, and have given to the service of Christianity, good citizenship and the upbuilding of national character more than any other class of men could possibly render. Let us reward them while they are with us, and show by our love and appreciation that the old saints are neither forgotten nor neglected.

You will have an opportunity to do this in the campaigns that are now being started to raise the necessary funds to place the Aged Preachers' Pensions on a sound basis. If the 24,000,000 members of the Protestant churches of America were to act unitedly in this great benevolence the work would be accomplished out of hand.

Have the angels written "Loyalty" against your name? Loyalty to your Young People's Society, to your pastor, to your church, to Jesus Christ!

UNCLE SAM, builder! His plans are beyond the wildest dreams of the Arabian Nights, and his achievements make Aladdin look like a piker. There has been nothing to compare with him. Uncle Sam raises his hand, and two-score military cities spring into being. King Kufu kept 100,000 men at work twenty years in constructing the great pyramid, and it took him ten years to make the road necessary to bring the stones from the quarry. Uncle Sam has made hundreds of miles of concrete road in the forty or fifty military cities I have referred to, and within a few months in Henry Park, halfway between the Capitol and the White House, he has just about completed in less than 100 days a great office building, which has a floor space more than twice as great as the ground upon which the mighty pyramid of Cheops is built.

WHEN the war began, the government service was running along at plow-horse speed. There were thirty or forty thousand employees who had been trained in the dilatory, red-tape methods of peace, and Uncle Sam had to put into action an army of new cost-efficiency experts and speed the old service up to the war. Billions of money were appropriated by Congress and gigantic plans were soon under way. The government sent out its requirements and hundreds of our best business men volunteered and came here from all parts of the Union; some of them accepted salaries which are less than 2 cents per week. Many brought their assistants, and, in addition, thousands of new clerks were demanded. They came by the trainload.

Within a few weeks the great department structures were overcrowded, the vacant buildings of Washington were rapidly filled, and large apartment houses in process of construction were taken over and used for war activities. Some of the big office buildings of the city were commandeered; the tenants were told to move out, and various branches of the government moved in. This was so with many apartment houses in which people were living. And still the clerks came, and Uncle Sam cried for more. He soon found, however, that in order to use the employees he had to have places where he could put them to work, and he is now scheming to build them quarters where they can sleep overnight.

The first question was to create office buildings in which the work could go on. Many of these have been built and aeres more are in process of construction. The first to go up was that which now forms the main offices of the Council of National Defense. It was built within forty-five days. Nevertheless, it covers half as much ground as the National Library and its floor space is almost four aeres. This was followed by a big two-story building for the Food Administration, which covers about twice as much ground as the pension building, famous as the largest brick building of the world. Then came the offices of the Fuel Administration, a double row of rooms running around a great court, with a front as large as that of the White House, and with a wall three times as long; and after that came the ordnance building, on Virginia avenue. This has a front larger than that of the National Treasury, and it covers more ground than the great granite structure which houses the departments of State, War and Navy. Nevertheless, it is nothing in comparison with the demands of the bureau by which it is filled, and great buildings to accommodate the overflow are now almost completed.

THE buildings I have described are all west of the White House, on ground that was once a part of Davy Burns' farm, the old homestead of which was still standing when I came to Washington several decades ago. In addition, new buildings are going up in all parts of the city, and the greatest office building ever created in the United States will have been completed by the time you are reading this letter. It was built in less than four months, and that notwithstanding its ground floor is so large that you could put the national Capitol building, the national Library building and the State, War and Navy building upon the same space and have something to spare. The building covers ten aeres and it has in the neighborhood of thirty aeres of floor space. It is made in three great units, with a heating plant in the center which fills the steam pipes running back and forth through this thirty aeres and making every cubic inch of it warm. All of these buildings are of frame with walls of metal lathing nailed on to studding with building paper on each side. The lathing is covered with stucco, and the inside walls are a thick pasteboard with wood strips over the joints. The buildings have double floors, and when completed they look much like the better class of suburban residences or the stuccoed houses erected at seaside resorts. They are lighted by electricity and heated by steam. They are built to last only for the time of the war, but there is no reason why they should not be standing ten years from now. They have all gone up within the past six months.

THERE are few things which are more disagreeable than a burning lamp which is short of oil. The flame is unsteady, flickering, fuming, spitting, smoking, giving far more discomfort than light. And there are few things in the moral world more disagreeable than people who keep their lamp burning with inadequate supplies of oil. They are unreliable, fitful, cheerless—altogether making far more smoke than fire. Hard duties cannot be sustained by a transient impulse, by the strength of a good resolution. He who is going to discharge Christian duties consistently will need unfailing springs of oil; he will need to feed his soul with eternal truth.

We cannot have exercise without bread; we cannot have the lamp burning without oil; we cannot have duty without truth. But we are all prone to think we can. There is nothing more common than for men to take up duties which they have not resources to discharge, to light lamps which they cannot keep burning. Here in the Bible is a whole host of duties, things which we have to do and things which we have not to do.

And men come and lay hold of these Christian duties, and they say: "We will make these our lamps. We will keep them burning in our daily life." And they light them, and they burn for a little while, but soon die down. How is it? They have taken the Biblical lamps without Biblical oil. They are trying to be godly without God; they are trying to be Christians without Christ, and they utterly and miserably fail.

LET us look at this. It is of sufficiently common experience to claim our serious thought. I am sure you must have again and again heard men who have been trying to live a good and dutiful life express themselves in this wise: "I get on very well for a time, and then . . ." Then their lamp goes out because they have no oil. They are trying to do Christian duty without Christian resources.

One of the most primary duties to which we are called is that of faithfulness, uprightness, scrupulous integrity, unbroken loyalty to conscience. Men vow themselves to discharge it. Young fellows especially, plunging with fresh, frank impulse into business life, resolve to observe the duty with absolute strictness. They light this lamp with faithfulness, and they begin their business career.

What do they find? Their eyes are opened to the cunning ways in which wealth is made. They see the success of deception. They mark how dishonesty multiplies its stores. They see all the many short cuts to desired ends. They see how easily one man cuts out another by a little sharp and crooked practice. They see that a serpent can twist and wriggle himself into places and positions into which a man with rigid moral backbone can never get. They see that their fiercest competitor is not the honest trader, but the trickster. They begin to suspect that trickery cannot be fought with weapons of rectitude, that only by more trickery can trickery be vanquished. Then after the suspicion follows the design: "That man is offering his soul for thirty pieces of silver; I can cut him out by offering my own for twenty. Shall I do it? Is faithfulness essential? Does integrity pay?" His lamp is going out; it needs oil! His resolution is dying; it needs food! Duty is waning; it needs to be fed with spiritual truth!

HOW is it to be done? Great Christian duties have to be sustained by great Christian roots. Botanists will tell you that, speaking roughly, the roots of a tree are as far-spreading as its branches. There is as much growth underground as there is above ground. There is as much unseen as there is seen. A great tree requires a great rootage, and so does a great duty. Every duty which the Lord prescribed demands an immense rootage. It requires the infinite! You can go through the Sermon on the Mount, and mark every duty, and opposite every duty you can write the words: "If grown, must be rooted in the Eternal!" But what do men do? They come to the Lord's life, and they take out what they call the morality, the moral duties, and leaving all the rest, they say: "These we will grow; with them we will adorn our life." You may as well try to grow an oak tree in a thimble! Divorce the duty from the infinite truth on which it feeds, and it will always be a dwarf.

For purposes of experiment I tried a little while ago to grow some wheat in a saucer. The seed germinated, sprouted; the blades shot up to the height of three inches, and then drooped and turned yellow, and "because it had no deepness of earth, it withered away." That is what a great many of us try to do with Christian duties; we try to grow them in shallow saucers, when they can only be grown in the infinite. Great Christian duties draw their food supplies from eternal truth, and apart from those supplies they will be lean and starved, and will ultimately die. The duty of faithfulness to men finds its support in the eternal truth of the faithfulness of God. A young fellow must feed on that! It must be tremendously difficult—I think it is impossible in these days—for any man to be scrupulously faithful to his own conscience, who does not feed himself on the great truth that God will be faithful to him. When the lamp of my faithfulness is flickering, and I am wondering if the path of honor is the way of safety, I will feed the lamp with the oil of this truth: "My God is faithful." When wickedness appears to have a momentary triumph, and integrity appears to be vanquished, and the lamp of my resolution needs to be revived, I will feed it with the oil of this eternal truth: "My God is faithful!"

ANOTHER duty to which we are called in the Christian life is the duty of unselfish service. We are called to light the lamp of service. Well, a great many respond to the call.

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

They take up the duty. They light their lamps. But how many there are who just burn up the oil of a little impulse, and then go out! Some take up service in the Sunday school, burn brightly for a little while, and then go out! Others interest themselves in one or other of the many institutions established to redeem the world, burn a little while, and then go out!

We all know these people. They are well-intentioned; they are good-hearted; but when they take up a duty, you know just how long they will burn—a week, or a month, or a year—and then there will be a flicker of excuses, prior to the light going out altogether. How is it? They have taken their lamps, but they have taken no oil with them. They are trying to do spiritual exercises on a starved soul. They are trying to do Christian duty without the bread of Christian truth. They do not draw upon any great eternal resource for power to sustain them in their service, and so their strength is spent.

What do they need? Food, bread, the Bread of Life. Look back across the ages, and call to the apostle John and ask him how it was that amid the cruelties of imprisonment and persecution he kept the lamp of duty burning in service for his fellows, and this sweet answer comes ringing back across the years: "I love—because He first loved me." Call to the apostle Paul, and ask him how it was that, amid the perils of false brethren, he could keep the lamp of service burning, and Paul sends back the response: "He loved me, and gave himself for me."

THAT was the apostolic resource, and that must be our resource today. The lamp of service is kept burning in hearts that feed on the Saviour's love. They who take up Christian duties without it are as virgins who take their lamps but take no oil to feed them. "He first loved me," says John. "He loved me and gave himself for me," says Paul. If you wish to be consistent in the doing of Christian service you must realize the Saviour's love. That keeps duty ever blazing with a bright and steady light.

Oh, men and women, this thought of the Saviour's love for you is a tremendous power for restoring flickering lamps; it fills them full of oil. Men who endure to the end, whose lamps burn out throughout the years, are men who feed daily on the eternal love of Christ.

I remember, some little while ago, noticing, in a parched and barren pasture, a thin line of beautiful green grass stretching across the whole breadth of the field. That thin line of green grass—green in the burning rays of the hottest summer noontides—marked the course of a tiny stream, which quietly bathed its roots, as it stole away on its secret bed. And sometimes in the parched field of human life, where one and another droop away from Christian service, I have known men and women whose services kept fresh and bright and beautiful, amid all manner of fierce attack, amid the harsh, dry glare of ingratitude and disappointment, and I have said to myself, "The river of life is secretly bathing their roots. They are feeding upon the Saviour's love."

So feed, and you will endure. Abide in Christ, and the lamp of service shall burn for evermore!

DAILY MEDITATION

Reverend
E. W. Caswell and
Prof. W. H. T. Dau

The Untraversed Continents

SUNDAY, March 10. Eph. 1:7. "The riches of His grace." There is always very grave necessity that we should be reminded of the untraversed stretches of country in our own being. There are forests which hide wonderful possibilities. There are new trails to be cut in the domain of thought and imagination which will open out vistas of light and beauty. What discernments are awaiting development! What sleeping powers, like the sleeping princesses in the old legend, are ready to spring into vigorous life and service! Yes, there are reaches of our own being which are like higher latitudes in undiscovered country.

Paul was very objective, and his counsels of exploration would lead us away from ourselves. "Not I, but Christ!" "While we look at the things which are not seen!" "Beholding the glory of the Lord!" "Looking unto Jesus!" There are hidden wonders in the untrodden realm of the divine love. There are new trials to be followed through the tropical luxuriance of redeeming grace. What we have already discovered is only as the finding of a single leaf as compared with boundless forests! It is only as the glint of a single nugget as compared with the wealth of unfathomable mines!

And the wonderful thing is that we can use our common circumstances as implements and ministers of exploration. We can use a dark circumstance to find a bright one. They say in Yorkshire—"Never a nettle without its dock!" Never a pain without there being at hand some compensating balm! Let the nettle lead you to look for the dock. Let the sting send you after the balm. Let some disappointment send you exploring for the riches of hope in Christ Jesus. Let some seeming failure stir you to gain the patience of unanswered prayer. Let some bereavement make you a zealous discoverer of the consolations of eternal life. Let your sin drive you in almost fierce quest of redeeming grace. Every circumstance may be used as an instrument of discovery, and every day we may advance more deeply into the higher latitudes of the wonderful love of God.

MONDAY, March 11. Rom. 1:14. "I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the barbarians, both to the wise and to the unwise." A debt is something owed. Our word "ought" comes from the word "owe." I "ought" means I "owe it." Paul recognized that he owed something to the world—not alone for what the world had done for him, not chiefly for that reason, but chiefly because of what he had found which the world did not possess. When we think through to a conclusion the matter of our indebtedness to the world both for what it has done for us, and what we can do for it, we shall confront one of life's greatest duties.

It is a startling fact that one-half of the world is without scientific medical knowledge; that one-half of the world is poor, under the burden of economic conditions which promise no improvement until and unless civilization rests upon a Christian basis. Millions of people in Egypt, Arabia, China, India and Africa suffer from preventable and curable diseases. We have the best medical and surgical science of the world. We send our manufactured goods to the world; shall we send mere chattels and not send the very best we have? There is an economic basis for foreign missions and the world is rapidly coming to a knowledge of it. But underneath and superior to all economic reasons for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts is the apostolic reason of personal and inalienable obligation. Enlightened Christians are debtors to the unenlightened world.

The Sustaining Love

TUESDAY, March 12. Rom. 8:35, 37. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us." The question has been raised whether the love of Christ, the enduring quality of which under the most adverse circumstances the apostle asserts in this text, is the love which Christ bears to us, or the love which we bear to him. As a matter of fact both views would be tenable.

The annals of the Christian Church, especially in the early centuries, are full of records of heroic endurance. Many Christians were subjected to the trials which the apostle mentions, and yet their love of the Lord was not quenched by them. It is not unlikely that the apostle himself had knowledge of instances of this kind when he wrote these words. In their tribulations the Christians proved themselves more than conquerors because their love of Christ not only caused them to despise their torments but in not a few instances won their tormentors for Christ. Besides, there are many unrecorded instances of Christian endurance and fortitude: thousands of Christians today suffer in silence and unobserved by their fellow Christians, and it is only their love of Christ that gives them the strength to bear up under their trials.

But the apostle in this connection is really speaking of "the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." (v. 39.) From this none of the unhappy events which he mentions shall be able to separate us. Jesus embraces as his very own these suffering saints whom the world treats as castaways and regards as an offscouring. While they are being tried, their chief concern is not whether they still love Christ but whether Christ still loves them. This assurance it is that the apostle wants to make very strong in this text: when everything goes against the Christian and the whole world turns away from him with disgust, Christ continues loving him, yea, comes closer to him and lets him feel his affection for him.

The Full Price Is Paid

WEDNESDAY, March 13. Heb. 6:1. "Let us go on unto perfection." There are many beginners in the Christian life who never go on unto perfect love and completeness in Christ. They are callers at the back door, waiting to receive scraps, when they might enjoy the fulness of God's blessing. It is said that a traveler who once took a trip on the Mississippi ate his meals for several days from a bag of crackers and cheese. At last, longing for a full dinner, he asked the purser the price of a meal. The reply was, "Your ticket includes all meals." Do not many Christian people deny themselves of the greater blessings of God's munificence, when they might continually enjoy an abundance of the divine presence, far above all they could ask or think? We all know that there is no extra charge for the baptism of the Holy Spirit for perfect love, soul purity and heart holiness. On Calvary, Jesus paid it all. The ruby drops of his precious blood wash all our sin away.

What did Jesus say? "O fools, and slow of heart to believe." "Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you, that ye may be endued with power from on high." Did not the loving father say to the cold-hearted elder son, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all I have is thine"? But he would not go in to the feast of abundance, for he preferred the company of the servants, the crusts and crumbs.

Christ's redemption is a full, free and mighty salvation. Its joy is unspeakable and full of glory. Its hope is big as eternity; its peace is like the bosom of God. The Master calleth for thee, to climb the Alpine peaks of holiness. When you reach those summits, you will never after seek "To lay your finite measuring rod

On the infinitude of God."

Kept from Falling

THURSDAY, March 14. Jude 24, 25. "Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, . . . to the only wise God, our Saviour." When Jude wrote these words he may have been thinking of Jesus' intercessory prayer in which the thought of keeping and being kept occurs thrice. The word he uses is not unknown in the vocabulary of military men, and carries with it the suggestion of such a safe keeping as calls for an armed guard. It is the same idea as that of Peter, who speaks of being "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation."

So, "kept" and "saved" are related: we are to keep some things in order that we may be kept, and we are both to keep and to be kept in order to be saved. We are to keep ourselves in the love of God and to be kept from falling. This is human cooperation with divine interposition.

The inscription on the monument which marks the resting-place of a saintly servant of God consists of a single word underneath the name and the dates of birth and death, and that word is "Kept." Let us be sure of this, that though we may not keep ourselves unto salvation, we may keep ourselves in close fellowship with One who is "able to keep us from falling and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy." We must keep close to our Keeper; we must keep him in sight every day, and, if the darkness hides him from our view, we must keep him in thought until the clouds are dispelled and the shadows vanish away.

One in Spirit

FRIDAY, March 15. 1 Cor. 6:17. "He that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit." When men have formed an attachment for one another that springs from purely unselfish motives, their hearts beat in unison and they habitually think the same thoughts. They have become one in spirit. One always tries to say and do what pleases the other. When a servant really loves his master and desires nothing else than to serve him, he watches the master's slightest movements; he regulates all his habits, he arranges his hours for sleeping and waking, for rest or labor, so as to be of the greatest service to his master.

When we become thoroughly joined to Jesus, our spirit is merged in his. He controls all our actions. Our thinking and willing is in response to his wishes. We come to understand by a sort of spiritual instinct what we ought to do to please him. As our physical organism is under the control of our mind, hands, feet, eyes, ears, promptly obeying the impulses that emanate from the soul, so the spirit of the Christian is under the regimen of the spirit of Christ. It does not require great arguments and much persuasion to make the Christian obey. Obedience is his very life. In Christ he lives and moves and has his being. The reason why the Bible contains so many admonitions, warnings, pleadings that are addressed to Christians is, because they are still in the flesh and sin still besets them. This is what renders their service still imperfect, and disturbs their union with the Lord. These admonitions are to remind them of their wonderful relation to Christ. Every genuine act of obedience, however, which they perform is not wrested from them by the logical force of some statement which they hear, or by the urgency of a plea that is made to them, or the persuasive power of a speaker, but it springs from their own love for Christ, of which they only needed to be reminded.

The Eyes of the Heart

SATURDAY, March 16. Eph. 1:18. "Having the eyes of your heart enlightened." The eye of the understanding has its own realm of vision, its own limited horizon, but the eye of faith and love of the heart sweeps all heavenly horizons. The veil of unbelief is not on the eye of the mind so much as on the heart. Tennyson's words, "I have felt," are a blessed consummation to the soul. We learn more from Christ's look of love than from any other source, for love is the instinct of the heart and the heart has loftier reasons than the intellect can give. It seizes absolute truth, beholds the invisible, and is conscious of the immortal. Reason is like a creeping child, while faith, a bird of paradise, brings back the leaf of promise to the believing soul.

One cannot prove the glory of the morning; it is a fact beyond demonstration. Such is the sun of righteousness to the soul.

When your child nestles in your arms, it is not reason that prompts you to caress it, but love burning in the heart. God does not guide his children so much with the reins of reason, just as you would guide a horse, but by his blessed personal presence. Love may be tempered by reason, but the great Corliss engine of the heart is the mighty power of love. When you give yourself to Christ, you will become like him, have his mind, and then you will do as you have a mind to, for it is his mind and heart that is Christ in you, the hope of glory. Do you believe in Jesus? Then you see and possess the beauty of salvation, the love that passes knowledge.

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

HOWARD reached out his hand, turned the tag so that its message could be deciphered and read: "From the expressman and the Agent. Bought with a check for a poem which the Agent expects to get."

Howard almost had a relapse as he read it.

"Place that on the foot of the bed. It'll help me to get well," he gasped, letting his laugh down into his old-time grin. But there were tears behind the grin, as there often were.

"When I get well enough, I'll make the Agent send me a copy of that poem. Tell me about the church, Roy. How's everything going?"

"Fine, all right. You didn't know I've been preaching for you, did you? Haven't dared to tell you before, for fear it might retard your recovery. But I've had a great time. Only I wish you'd tell me how you manage to keep your folks awake. Some of your best people fall peacefully to sleep before I get to the second hymn. They look so happy, I can't bear to wake 'em up. The only time they rouse up is when I say something about you, so I mention you often. And—oh, yes, you'll be interested to know Deacon Allen comes regularly every morning on his way down town. He was here the night we thought you were going." He did not mention Inez.

"Everybody's very kind," Howard murmured. "I didn't know—"

"All the ministers have been here. They've kept up the union mid-week services and the Sunday night. I heard something about a curious letter Brother Noyes had had from his Mission Board. But I don't know what it is. He said he wanted to counsel with you when you were able."

"Has any one else called?" Howard asked after a while.

"Any one else? Why, you old bach, the whole town has called. You've been the most called-on man in the history of the town."

Howard grinned again, but rather sheepishly, and Roy Lennox, looking gravely at him, was saying to himself: "I've half a mind to tell you, but I guess I won't. Some things are better to find out for yourself."

BUT as he sat there by the bed he pictured Agnes Burton, as he had caught the look on her face as she presided at the little organ, bravely trying to conceal her feelings and knowing all the while she was betraying her deep interest in the outcome of the struggle going on at the parsonage. Do what she would, exercise all the self-control of which she was capable, and she was capable of a great deal, she could not conceal from herself that her heart was there, not here in this little church, and when Lennox began to preach she could not help seeing in his place the fiery, unconventional, wide-awake minister, unlike any one else in Red Hill, as he swung around the little pulpit, sometimes, in his eagerness, putting one foot out over the edge of the platform until she was afraid he was going to fall off, and then with one swift stride he would be over near the chorus end of the platform appealing to all the young people there to lead the clean life, while her own heart beat quick as his eye flashed and his whole bearing spoke of power and the joy of living. And she could see the faces in the congregation—faces she had known since she was a little girl—and noted the astonishing change in them; no longer apathetic or sleepy or indifferent, but awake; interested, for the first time since they were born, in a religion which was becoming as real as money and as big as all outdoors. She could almost laugh there in church as she watched Deacon Allen struggling with his conservatism and his affection, gasping as Howard tore in pieces some life-long doctrine or habit, and tears in his eyes as the next minute he touched some tender chord of memory in the old man's heart not touched for long dry dusty years.

AND she knew, as she sat there, her mind and heart over in the parsonage, that if it were not for a world-wide conventionalism which made women repress their feelings, she would rise from her place in the chorus and go swiftly over across the little yard and fall on her knees before Rose and beg her to let her be near him. She could not by any effort conceal her interest, and during those days her face, as the Expressman told the Agent, was like a ghost's, if ghosts have faces. And more than the Expressman saw it, and commented on it. For Red Hill, in spite of all that happened, had not become angelized yet sufficiently to let go of the Expressman's "human interest"; in this particular case feeling a glow of more than ordinary "interest" in seeing a romance wrought out before their very eyes.

With Howard's sure and complete recovery Agnes Burton, almost at a bound, recovered her usual joyful and animated appearance. So that, by the time Howard was able to go out and meet her for the first time, she presented a picture of health and loveliness that struck him with an unpleasant sense of irritation. His first greeting was rather formal. As for herself, she was struggling again to repress her joy and replied to his commonplaces with others. And he did not understand how, if she did care, as she had seemed to that evening she had asked him if he was well, she could be going about looking so glad and so gloriously healthy and happy.

Stupid! Ah, yes. But, then, Howard Chase was a child, almost, as to his real knowledge of womankind.

THERE came a day early that fall when Howard was able to resume his pulpit and parish work, and Roy Lennox and his wife had made their plans and fixed the date for their departure, with Inez, for New York.

They were all together at the parsonage the evening before the day they were to leave, and George Clark, Deacon and Mrs. Burton and Agnes were guests at the evening meal. Inez sat between her teacher and Mrs. Lennox, and the talk at the table flowed back and forth.

Inez was silent, grave, even serious, as she listened. She sat there doubting over many things, anticipating and dreading the future, and wondering how it was all coming out.

After the meal Mrs. Burton, the deacon, Clark, Agnes, and Mr. Lennox seemed to form a group for a moment, while Howard had gone into his study to get a circular Roy had been asking for, and Inez went out into the kitchen where Rose was busy.

"Miss Chase, will it be all right if I see Mr. Chase just a moment? I only want to say a word to him—I—"

Rose looked at her. She was trembling. A look in her face expressed a feeling that made Rose want to take her in her arms as if she were a little sorrowful child who had lost a cherished toy.

"He's in the study now. I only want to say a word."

Rose nodded, and Inez slipped back into the sitting-room, and in through the half-open door of the study.

Howard was at his desk, and before he could prevent it she had fallen on her knees and seized his hand and carried it to her lips.

"Oh, Mr. Chase! You are good. Pray for me. I'm not a bad girl. But I'm afraid—now—I thought when you were going to die that I could not live. I never meant to do you any harm. Pray for me, won't you? I'm going to be afraid down there."

Howard gently withdrew his hand and put it on Inez's head. And at that moment it seemed to Inez as if in some real way her feeling for the minister changed from what it had been to one of lasting respect and confidence as her friend and pastor.

He was saying, "Inez, remember you are going to be in the home of two of the best people in all the world. You were born to be a useful and happy woman. You will have the help of their counsel and friendship. And promise me, Inez, promise God that you will not get in the way of anything that will help to make a useful and happy woman of you."

"Miss Burton asked me the same thing," said Inez simply.

She was on her feet brushing away her tears, a different look on her face, as Howard said cheerfully, "We all expect great things of you. And don't forget what you've promised."

"No, I won't, Mr. Chase." She said it impulsively. "And I'll never forget your great kindness to me and what you did that Sunday."

"It's going to be all right," said Howard.

NEXT day an interested group was down at the Santa Fe to see Mr. and Mrs. Lennox and Inez off on Number Ten. Red Hill knew all about the invitation given to Inez by the Lennoxes, and various comments were made, for it is not to be understood that Red Hill ceased to talk about its neighbors and one another all on account of one sermon. That would be pushing the miracle too far. But much of the "human interest" insisted on by the Expressman is a good thing. So Red Hill thought of the astonishing good fortune that had come to Inez and talked accordingly.

The Expressman ventured to say to her after getting her trunk checked for her: "You look prettier than any picture I ever see. I bet New York folks'll turn around and look at you when you go walking up Fifth Avenue. But I hope it won't turn your head any to have 'em look around."

Inez blushed and shook the Expressman's rough and not over clean hand, and the tears came as she remembered his many little acts of kindness.

The Agent came up also, somewhat diffidently holding out to Inez a type-written card which he said she could read after the train started.

"It's a pity the Santa Fe don't run to New York," he said. "You'll be all right up to the Dearborn Station, then you'll have to watch your step the rest of the way. That's the reason I thought you might remember what's on the card."

He didn't say it was his own literary effort, but Inez and Mrs. Lennox guessed it was as they read it:

Safety first on cars and trains,
Saves many travelers aches and pains;
And no matter how great the hurry,
Safety first saves time and worry.

THE last view the little group at the station had of Inez was the sight of her between Mr. and Mrs. Lennox on the rear platform as Number Ten swung through the bridge over the creek and disappeared around the curve of Red Hill bluff. And Howard Chase as he turned back to his work breathed a sigh of relief, and offered a prayer full of hope for this one of his flock.

He took up his work with his accustomed energy and enthusiasm. As the time went on he began to realize some changing conditions.

In the first place, his long illness and absence from his pulpit had affected his congregation somewhat. The first Sunday he appeared, the church was filled. Then as the weeks succeeded one another, his congregations dropped off. No community or church lives on the mountain top all the time or strikes twelve every hour. And human nature in ministers being about like the same thing in other people, Reverends Noyes, Harris and Gray had put on an extra spurt of ecclesiastical effort while Howard was ill.

But Howard was not one of the easily discouraged type, and he had a strain of doggedness in his make-up that some men of brilliant and quick action completely lack. He "pegged away," as he said to Rose, with the firm belief that if he continued to make his services attractive and worth while, people would come any way.

So he went after one thing and another, getting acquainted with the farmers, starting a census of the town and getting ready to propose a scheme he had been brooding over during his convalescence, to unite in one general interest the entire life of the town.

INCLUDED in this scheme was the straightening out of the film business, and one day when big Jake Seymour was well enough, Howard went over to his little house to talk matters over and see what could be done.

Seymour greeted him very cordially and frankly expressed his doubts about reforming the business. He was going to open his "movie" in a few days, and he showed Howard a printed list of films he had had a friend send him from Kansas City.

"These titles here on your list marked with the red pencil, what are they?" Howard asked.

"Those are films passed by the Appeal Board over the censors."

"Tell me about that," Howard said, in his rapid-question manner.

THE motion picture man went into the history of the censorship of films in the state, Howard interrupting often.

"Then do you mean to tell me that the Appeal Board, consisting of the Governor, the Attorney General and the Secretary of State, sometimes do not see these films that go out advertised as passed over the censors?"

"Sure. If they happen to be out of town some one in their offices, some subordinate clerks, pass on the film, and it goes out over the state 'Passed by the Appeal Board over the censors'. And let me tell you right now that one of the worst pictures ever shown in Kansas a few weeks ago went out over the condemnation of the censors with the Appeal Board's endorsement, and not one of the members of the Appeal Board ever saw it."

"Then, see here, Mr. Chase. We're up against it here in Red Hill, because I'm on a lock system, and have to take what is sent me. And I don't have time after the stuff comes in on Number Five to look it over. And then I can't afford, of course, to take big reels put out by the producers of the high-class stuff. They charge seven dollars and a half as a minimum for any film they send out. After I've paid my express and rent and lights and heat and incidentals I don't ever make over twenty-seven a week, and in the off seasons I don't clear much more than ten or fifteen, and that ain't much, even if I am an old bach, in these times of high living."

"And they sure do send me some of the worst stuff. It's old and patched up and cheap. I mean the film, and the stories are the limit. Cowboy stuff and love slush that makes you want to get into the picture and knock the bloomin' lid off the hero and the heroine. Excuse me for using that word bloomin', but it's a substitute for a stronger one. I'm ready and willing to help the preachers clean up the movie, but will you tell me how to clean up the authors who write the skinaros and the picture fellers who turn the characters in the silly stories into next door to idiots and insaners. You've got to go back of the Appeal Board and its absent members, and back of the Censors who have to pass judgment on what's sent 'em, and back of the exchanges who are simply selling what they get, clear back to the men and women who write the rot that gets made up into nightmares.

"I tell you, Mr. Chase, if you can help put the right kind of show into this town you will do the kiddies a lot of good. For, believe me, they are getting some pretty seamy looks at tough life that ain't doin' 'em any good, and when the Appeal Board or its substitutes pass a film that the Censors rejected they don't seem to give a thought to the kiddies; it's only grown-ups they seem to have in mind. But I see more kiddies than any one else at the show here, and it's so everywhere."

Howard talked with Seymour a long time, found him a rough, rugged soul, but with an honest heart and a real love of the kiddies, and came away feeling that the show problem in Red Hill was not a simple one; but, setting his resolute will and fiery enthusiasm to the working of it out, assured that Seymour would help, not hinder, any real honest effort to better the conditions.

AND then, as the fall months passed, and winter began, Howard Chase came into a new experience—so new, so unexpected, so humiliating, that he felt as if he were losing his identity and were some one else reincarnated.

Number Five brought the daily mail from the East, and one night as Howard sat in his little study Rose brought in a letter which kept brother and sister up late, debating on the right course.

The letter, addressed to the Rev. Howard Chase, Red Hill, Kansas, was from a minister living in Maine, telling Howard of a cousin of Howard's father, relating a pitiful story of trouble, and after many details closing with the assurance that there was nothing but the poorhouse for this cousin unless Howard, the only near relative, the only relative of any sort, in fact, would assume the obligations of kinship and either take the cousin into his own home or pay for his board and room at a private house. The letter also intimated that in all probability there would be need of a private nurse and doctor before the winter was over, and other personal obligations which would increase the expenses.

"It's Cousin Alfred!" Howard exclaimed. "How often father used to speak of him and his unfortunate business venture! And to think of him facing the poorhouse! Why, he's a university man! But we can never let him go to the poorhouse! It would disgrace the family! It's not to be thought of!"

"And I don't see how we could take him in here!" Rose said, anxiously. "He's too old and feeble, according to this letter. And besides, with all your church, and—"

"No. That isn't feasible, Rose. We must send him the money, and let this brother do what he offers in the way of finding a place for him."

"But you haven't any money, Howard!" said Rose with a feeling of dismay and almost terror. "You told me the other day you had only $250 in the bank."

"Sister," said Howard cheerfully, "you let me manage this. This is a man's job. I'll get the money. We simply can't let one of the Chase family go to the poorhouse! Why, it's unthinkable! But you leave it to me. I'll manage it. It's my lookout."

A RAPID and exhaustive correspondence followed with the brother in Maine, and as a result, after being convinced that there was no other course open, Howard sent on half of his savings to meet a long-standing indebtedness and provide for the first two months' care in a private house. And he breathed freer to think an honored cousin of his father was not in the poorhouse.

Then he set himself resolutely to increase his salary. He had tried the pen while in the seminary, and knew he had a gift that way, but had not wanted to take the time from his sermon-writing.

But now he sat up until one and two o'clock writing articles for money. A young people's magazine paid him $15 for a religious editorial, and asked him for others. He responded with two a month, and the little yellow check came with pleasant promptness. And during those three months following the receipt of the letter from Maine he opened up a vein of anecdotal items that brought him small sums ranging from two to seven dollars apiece.

But then came a new experience, that at first bewildered, then angered, then humiliated him. And following that feeling he had a fear, a real penetrating fear, the kind that makes the cold sweat break out on a brave man when he wakes up suddenly at night and sees no way of escape from a sure danger.

Deacon Allen served as church treasurer. The first six months of Howard's pastorate the deacon paid him his check every Monday—$17.25. Howard, who had come out of seminary with a little surplus, put half the check into the bank, gave his sister the rest, and contented himself with drawing on small amounts by check as he needed it. The expenses of the parsonage were not heavy, and Rose, who was a miracle worker as a housekeeper, managed to keep almost within the amount Howard gave her.

BUT as that eventful winter crept on, Deacon Allen's check was less and less prompt. Sometimes with a half apology he would hand Howard a part of the amount, saying something about the difficulty of keeping up the pledges, or muttering a word about the hot dry summer and the discouraging outlook for crops.

Let us hasten to add that Deacon Allen was not personally actuated by any small or mean motive so far as church finances were concerned. But following a life-long habit of thinking, in common with nearly every other member of the church, he gave as little as he dared to the annual expense, and went on the supposition that Howard had some means somewhere (look at his rich New York friends) and it did not matter much if the salary were not paid every week. Of course it would be all made up some time at the end of the year, when they always faced a deficit and covered it with a more or less painful surgical operation on the pocketbooks of the few loyal men who would either double their subscriptions under pressure or help buy the articles the Ladies' Aid Society had first extracted from their husbands in the raw material, made up into Christmas gifts to themselves.

But as the holidays approached and Deacon Allen's checks suspended altogether for two weeks, Howard faced a condition he had never dreamed could be possible. The deacon had explained that the furnace needed repairing, and a number of other necessary items like insurance, and so forth, must be met. That week an urgent letter from the brother in Maine, supplemented by two large bills from a doctor and a nurse, brought a response from Howard that drew the last dollar out of his bank, and for the first time in his life he faced debt.

He had had a horror of it all his life, and by superhuman efforts had managed to keep clear. But now he faced it and did not see any way out, and for the first time in his life he felt humiliated, deeply and cruelly.

And why, asks some hard-headed business man, didn't the fool go to his Board of Trustees and tell them to pay him or find another preacher?

Yes. Ask the ministers, some of them missionaries on our own Kansas frontier, why they don't resort to heroic measures to raise their own salaries! And see what answers you get.

Under other circumstances, Howard would have gone to Deacon Burton. But several reasons were in the way. How could he make his private affairs public, tell the people, or even Deacon Burton, that because he had assumed the kinsman's obligation to keep a relative out of the poorhouse he was seriously embarrassed financially? The church was under no obligation to support his relatives. That was his affair. He could not make the public a confidant in his private matters.

But there was another reason why it was out of the question to go to Deacon Burton.

"We've Created A Body Of Master Tire Builders"

Uniform Tires or "Lottery" Tires?

Decide Between Them, Once for All

TIRES contain much handwork. Hence they must always differ in mileage as the men who build them differ. To make tires uniform—as Miller has done—"human variables" must go.

This explains why all the tires of any other brand are not so good as the best of that brand.

Moreover, there is no way (when you buy) to tell the "lucky" tire from the faulty.

At one time Miller Tires varied as the others do. Now 99 Millers in 100 exceed the standard guarantee.

Less than one per cent ever require adjustment. That means that Miller Tires are 99 per cent excellent.

And in Akron, Ohio, where seven-tenths of all tires are produced, the Miller outsells at retail every other make.

Miller succeeded in building Uniform Tires by producing a body of Uniform Tire-builders.

GEARED-TO-THE-ROAD

Today these Miller workmen are the champions of the industry.

Each one is rated on his personal efficiency. Each tire that he builds is counted for or against him. If ever one comes back his standing is penalized.

Yet under this searching system these men average 96 per cent perfect.

Questions and Answers

JOHN G. WILLIAMSON, Camp Lee, Petersburg, Va., writes this letter which many will read with interest: "In the February Gleaner of the Christian Herald, 'Constant Reader,' New York, asks a question as to how the soldiers on the firing line and in the cantonments stand on the question of reading the Testament and the issues of the Christian Herald. Now, being a soldier myself, and one vitally interested in the religious side of soldier activity, I wish to say what has been my observation and the truth of the matter. I find men here are reading their pocket Testaments in larger numbers, and as a rule, are more prompt in attending services, than if they were in civilian life. Hence my conclusion is that money spent in Testaments is absolutely used to a good end. It has been the custom here for men to come without Bibles or Testaments, and their people seem to forget this, in their attempts to furnish them other things, especially cats. Now, as to the other phase: Do the boys read the Christian Herald? I say yes, but in Company G, 317th Infantry, where I am, there is only one paper sent and fully fifty men are reading it. We are furnished here a great deal of reading material, but as a rule it is all back numbers, ranging from 1937 to the current numbers. You are authorized to use the two paragraphs above or the whole letter, if you wish, for the benefit of the persons who may be interested."

We regard this letter, from a Christian soldier, as fairly presenting the situation, not only in his own but in other camps. Testaments are not only needed, but they are welcomed and better still, they are being used, and will continue to be used, to win many souls. We wish we could supply the soldiers in the camps with enough Christian Heralds to meet all requirements.

Rev. Worth M. Tippy sends the very practical suggestion that friends, in writing to our boys in camp, should send cheerful letters, and not those of the depressing sort. He quotes from a letter on this subject received by the Council of National Defense in which the writer says: "If the home folks in some way were made to realize that it is difficult enough for the boys to concentrate on the serious task in hand, and give their best thought and energy to training for service, they would no doubt be glad to write of the more encouraging side of things, and such matters as would help, instead of hinder." General Johnson, in command at Camp Upton, suggests that if ministers could bring the matter to the attention of their congregations and induce them to write letters of the "cheer up" sort, they would render a real service to the army administration.

W. M. C., Wilmington, N. C., writes: "In these days of food conservation, I think too much emphasis cannot be put on the use of sea-food. I enclose a clipping about the rise of shark meat, but I want to add, from my own experience, that broiled or fried 'glaucaus' (let us not call it 'shark') is much superior to smoked shark. If horseflesh were called 'cheval' steak, it would sell more readily. I am sure. 'Beef' sounds more appetizing than 'cow meat' would (to say nothing of 'bullflesh' or 'ox meat'). Let's give horseflesh and shark the new names of 'cheval' and 'glaucaus.'"

In a recent article in the Christian Herald, Frank G. Carpenter wrote quite appreciatively of shark meat, and recommended it as a suitable fish food. As to horseflesh, we read that it is now used a good deal in Paris and doubtless in other European cities also, but it has not yet been considered here.

B. N., Guthrie, Okla. The subject is not in our line, and we would advise you to consult with a reputable physician.

D. E. R., Elm Creek, Neb. It is proposed on both sides in the present war that there should be entire "freedom of the seas" after the war. This implies free intercourse for commerce by water in all parts of the world. The phrase which has frequently been used in the past, of this or that nation "ruling the seas," simply means that the nation in question has had the largest navy.

M. D. N., West Lafayette, Ohio. "I have read the article in the Christian Herald of January 30, not with interest, but sadness. When any church or minister has to resort to picture shows to draw a crowd, I believe that minister has failed in his mission. The power has departed, the power that comes from God to build up and strengthen his followers and add to his Church. 'Oh yes,' says one, 'I want to belong to the church; but I want to do as I please.' There is danger of belonging to the Church and not to Christ. Too many in the churches are not converted, and that is the kind of food they want and relish best, and that is the reason they crowd the movies, theaters, etc. The Church and Sabbath were not made for such performances. The crowd will soon weary of them, as they have of church services, and will seek some new thing that may come along to amuse them. We need Billy Sundays all over our land to draw the crowd, to hold up Christ and the cross, to show the people their sins and the need of repentance and faith in the Son of God. When a man is filled and led by the Holy Spirit, that church will draw without picture shows. If the people want these, let them take them in any night in the week, but help us to keep God's day holy. A company of soldiers was to leave. Friends thought to entertain them before leaving, with music, plays, etc., and at the close they replied, saying, 'We thank you but tomorrow we go to the front. We face death and we are not prepared for it. We want to know about our souls' salvation. The above is but a faint picture of thousands over our land today; they want to know of Christ and his blood applied to their souls to fit them for heaven. They want God's Word not 'movies,' to show them the way of life everlasting. May God supply all their needs!'

J. S. C., Montgomery, Ala. 1. The two genealogies are found in Matt. 1 and Luke 3. 2. No one has the right to assert that any truly repentant sinner is lost. God's mercy is boundless, and "whosoever will may come." 3. We know nothing whatever about the phenomenon in question, although it may have been a mirage, as you suggest. 4. There are still unevangelized areas in a large part of Tibet and other sections of Central Asia, a good deal of Western China, considerable of the interior of Africa, and, we believe, some parts of South America. 5. Christ came to call not the righteous, but sinners to repentance. We think, on the showing made in your letter, you should continue with the class, if it is as you describe. 6. It is a matter for your good judgment to decide. It is hardly a question of morals. 7. We are not especially interested in theosophy. 8. You can help those around you chiefly by your influence and personal example. As for church-going, it should be remembered that it is enjoined upon us "not to forsake the assembling of ourselves" in worship, and that "a day in thy courts is better than a thousand." Further, "Them that honor me I will honor." It would be well to state to your pastor something concerning the conditions you describe, and act in co-operation with him. If he be a true shepherd, he will try to lead the errant ones into the fold. 9. We are afraid we cannot answer your last question.

E. F. Montgomery, Ala. Certainly, Christ taught kindness to animals. See Matt. 12: 11, 12 and Luke 14: 5. The application to animals in general, as the companions and servants of man, is quite justifiable.

M. J. H., Grafton, W. Va. There is no such passage in the Bible. It may, however, be in some of the apocryphal books, which are bound up with some large editions of the Bible; but we cannot say this positively.

W. L. A. S., Rosboro, Ark. Your questions are controversial.

Mrs. R. B. Montreal, Canada. Who were the Nethinim that went from Babylon to Jerusalem with Ezra, and what was their position in the Jewish polity?

"Nethinim" is the name given in the Hebrew book written after the exile to those hereditary temple servants who were assigned to the Levites to perform the subordinate duties. The name means "devoted," or "set apart." Leading Jewish commentators agree almost unanimously that the progenitors of the "Nethinim" were the Gibeonites whom Joshua decreed to be perpetually hewers of wood and drawers of water. Those Gibeonite bondsmen or slaves were diminished by the persecutions of Saul and under David, and other rulers. Aliens and captives of war were assigned to the duties of "Nethinim," doing menial service, not only to the priests, but to the people at large. This view is confirmed by the fact that there are many foreign names on the list of those who returned from exile in Babylon.

R. S. McL., Yates Center, Kan. Please explain Matt. 5: 22, "Whosoever shall say, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire."

The use of such an expression denotes on the part of the speaker a bitter heart and a great lack of sympathy and charity for others. It implies not only angry temper, but a scornful, contemptuous feeling that is inconsistent with the love and meekness which characterize Christ's disciples, leaving the reasonable reference that the person so speaking is by no means a Christian, and is therefore in danger of condemnation.

Constant Reader, Cincinnati, Ohio. For two young people, who are deeply in love, to marry against the wishes of the young woman's mother, might be a very unwise step to take. Young people are apt to overlook obstacles which to older folks may appear serious. It is probable that the lady's mother, in objecting to the union, may not be influenced by any selfish considerations, but solely by a desire for her daughter's welfare. At all events, her objections should not be thoughtlessly overruled. Hasty marriages are usually followed by long and bitter regrets. If both young people are true Christians, they will doubtless succeed in winning the mother's consent in the end after she has been convinced of the young man's worthiness.

An Appeal for Constantinople College

By PROFESSOR SAMUEL T. DUTTON.

EARLY in December a cablegram from Constantinople came to the New York office of the Constantinople College, reading: "Arrived. Safe, well. College good condition. Patrick."

In ordinary times such a cablegram would provoke no comment, but today its brief words are full of deep significance. It means that Dr. Mary Mills Patrick, the president of Constantinople College, a woman and an American, managed to penetrate into the Ottoman Empire, from whence all but those belonging to the nations of the Central Powers are kept rigidly away. Probably no other American could have accomplished such a feat. But Dr. Patrick, known for her large-minded devotion to the women of Turkey and for her unflinching service in their education these many years, obtained special permission from the heads of the Turkish government to pass unchallenged the barriers that separated her from her college. She has joined her gallant faculty of American women, who, notwithstanding inconveniences and hardships and all the darkness and uncertainty of war time, have stood by their college for three long years.

The college has as many as 350 students this year, including Greeks, Armenians, Turks and Bulgarians. As in times past, it continues to give a liberal American education to those who flock to its doors for inspiration and learning.

It has been customary to regard Constantinople College merely as an educational institution. Today we must look at it in a different light. Today it is not only a college of high standing, but it is also a relief station for many kinds of distress. Within its walls it harbors needy and destitute girls, those who have felt the pinch of war only too keenly, and the bitterness of persecution. While it educates its students, it shelters and protects them at the same time. Nor does its relief work stop here. It has made of itself a center for the poor of the immediate neighborhood, where they can come for help and work, where they know they will meet with kindness and sympathy. Like a light on a hilltop, the college shines for humanity in a country torn by war and ravaged by affliction.

DR. PATRICK told, while she was in this country, how the students of the college, many of them poor themselves, helped the refugees by distributing food and articles of clothing which they themselves had made. The college at one time volunteered fifteen hundred garments for the hospitals. The money for this scheme was collected by a committee made up of representatives of the student body and the faculty.

The friends of Constantinople College as well as the indefatigable president and her colleagues are busy making plans for the future. With that sureness of vision which they have acquired through long practice, they see that in the reconstruction period after the war leaders will be needed, especially leaders among women. It is their dream that Constantinople College shall have the joy and privilege of educating those leaders for the stupendous task which the new generation must take upon itself, to rehabilitate a war-torn country and uplift its broken peoples. They desire that in the future Constantinople College alumnae shall go out equipped not only in the liberal, but also in the vocational and practical arts, and bring their own people out of a past full of war and bitter memories, into a present bright with the promise of peace and prosperity and advancement.

AMONG the practical departures which Constantinople College is contemplating are a training school for teachers and a medical school, where both women doctors and nurses may be trained.

Normal schools for teachers are very few indeed throughout the empire. Teachers are what Turkey needs, hundreds and thousands of teachers. What can a country do without education?

In the great city of Constantinople of a million and a half inhabitants there is no place where teachers can be trained. The college has given courses in pedagogy, has in fact made a brave beginning, but there is much more to be done.

Any one familiar with conditions in the East knows how imperative is the need for doctors and nurses. The reports of the medical missionaries, who are doing a heroic work, show only too plainly how much unnecessary suffering could be avoided if only there were more good doctors, and how great is the ignorance concerning the very rudiments of hygiene among the mass of the people. There is no medical school for women in the whole of the Ottoman Empire. Even nurses must in most cases obtain their training abroad. Is it to be wondered at that Constantinople College longs to fill this very present need, by a well-equipped medical school with its complement of a training school for nurses?

Here lies the real ambition of these splendid American women, who have so much at heart the welfare of Eastern girls,—to make them leaders, to give them the torch of learning, not in one branch but in many, that they may in turn light all the untrimmed lamps throughout the empire.

CONSTANTINOPLE College is at present in great need of funds. In order that she may carry out these extensive plans for leadership, that she may continue to administer relief to suffering neighbors, that she may be kept running at all, she must have many generous friends. We feel confident that Americans only need know of this important work and this unique opportunity to be deeply interested in it. The appeal is made to you, readers of the Christian Herald, for contributions to help Constantinople College for Women. Will you not respond? Any sum will be gratefully received. No sum is too small, no interest too slight, and every dollar is a help. Contributions to this cause made through the Christian Herald will be promptly forwarded.

America's responsibilities have increased a hundredfold in the past year. Nowhere, however, is the path for uplift and service plainer than in the Near East. Let it never be said that an American institution in Turkey suffered at any time for a lack of friends. It never will be said. For they have never been wanting in the past, and how can they fail now in this hour of greatest need?

Make Woodlots Productive

THE farm woodlots of New York State are not producing more than one-fourth of the timber they should furnish, according to the forestry department of the State College of Agriculture. They should be brought to a high state of productivity as a war measure. A large part of the coal now used in rural districts could well be supplemented or supplanted by wood from the farm timber tract. A great deal of land in New York is better fitted for timber than for any other purpose. At least forty per cent. of the state is already in timber. Twelve per cent. is in farm woodlots, most of which owe their existence to circumstances coupled with neglect, rather than to any carefully laid-out plan.

There's a Pepsin Tooth Paste

Which Dentists Now Advise

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

To Destroy the Film

The greatest foe your teeth have is a film. Nearly all tooth troubles are caused by it. And many serious diseases nowadays are traced to the germs it breeds.

It is that slimy film which you feel with your tongue. It clings to the teeth. It gets into crevices and stays, resisting the tooth brush.

That is what discolors — not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food particles which ferment and form acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth — the cause of decay.

It breeds millions of germs which cause many diseases. Pyorrhea is chiefly due to those germs and to tartar.

The reason for brushing teeth is mainly to combat that film. But the old methods utterly failed. The best-brushed teeth will often discolor and decay. And tooth troubles have constantly increased.

That is because the damaging film is largely left intact. Many tooth pastes, it is found, make it more difficult to remove.

Now a way has been found to combat that film. Able authorities have proved it by three years of clinical tests. Now, with their approval of the product, we urge you to prove it — a way called Pepsodent.

Watch It for a Week

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous, and the object is to constantly dissolve it.

Pepsin was not used before because it must be activated. And the usual activating agent is an acid, harmful to the teeth.

But science has now found an activating method which cannot harm the teeth. That method is used in Pepsodent — and in Pepsodent only, because of the several patents.

Three years of clinical tests have proved that Pepsodent can solve the film problem. It destroys the film and prevents its accumulation. Those who know this feel that every person should have a chance to prove it, and at once.

So we offer a One-Week tube. Send the coupon for it. Use it like any tooth paste—it is delightful.

Then watch the results. Note how clean your teeth feel after using. Note how your teeth whiten as the film disappears. You will see for yourself that Pepsodent does what was not done before.

You will then know the way to clean, safe teeth — an easy, pleasant way. It is vitally important.

Jesus Sending Forth the Twelve

Mark 6:1-31

Christian Missions. II. General Principles

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

FROM the varied material of the Sixth Chapter of Mark we are to select the sending of the twelve as our central point of interest and to gain from it if we can some general principles of all Christian missionary work. We may find a natural connection between the story of the rejection at Nazareth and Jesus' attempt to enlarge the influence of his ministry by commissioning his helpers. Coming as it did after so much outside hostility, the opposition from his old neighbors made him realize that he must perpetuate his teachings in able apostles ere he should himself suffer the fate that had befallen John the Baptist.

So we have the account of a "trial trip" by these novices in evangelism, undertaken only after long instruction and much practical observation of the Master's methods. It reminds us of the absolute necessity of eager young Christians subjecting themselves to years of preparation in order to become worthy representatives of their Lord. Untrained workers will fail in meeting the complex situation of our time. We must give our best and develop our best for Christ's use.

The new recruits went off on their six little circuits and then returned at an appointed time for conference with their Leader and discussion of their experiences. Later he repeated the practice tours, on one occasion sending forth seventy volunteers. This is still a practical model for evangelistic work on our foreign fields where numerous native workers, after receiving instruction in the rudiments, are sent forth to "learn by doing."

The Village Christ

The spell of great cities is upon men nowadays. Country boys, budding artists and authors, physicians, even ministers and missionaries are restless till they can locate in some busy metropolis. But the missionaries, closest to Christ perhaps, are the least susceptible to this lure. At all events they find that the only way to permeate huge masses of heathen peoples is to go forth in the villages and "throw away their lives" teaching and healing.

Jesus lived to be thirty years of age in a small town of no reputation. When he undertook to choose his apostles, he did not go up to Jerusalem for them. And the greater part of his ministry was spent going "about the villages teaching" (Mark 6:6). This is the method of patience and lowliness which most missionaries are called to follow. It means that we must have humility and unselfishness like his. He did not establish his kingdom by going to Rome, the capital of the world, to wear a triple crown and gorgeous robes and to impose his will on the souls of men. He lived and toiled in Galilee, then sent forth likened men, until the earth was leavened with the Gospel.

It does us good to hear of consecrated men of ability who build up country parishes where the church is the light of the community, and who resist the tendency to emigrate to the great centers. It is fine to learn that Robert Moffat captured David Livingstone for Africa by that thrilling phrase "the smoke of a thousand villages."

Some Elements of Missionary Methods

Let us take Mark's brief summary of Jesus' instructions to the twelve and see if we can find in them some at least of the fundamental principles involved. Certainly these are not hard and fast rules, for Jesus dealt with spiritual laws and not with petty details. As a matter of fact, we see here certain elements of all Christian endeavor whether on the foreign field or on the frontier at home, or in the local parish of a church. Let us take them in the order mentioned by Mark.

1. Fellowship in Effort. Jesus sent them out by two and two. It is interesting to notice how that continued to be the New Testament practice: e. g. Peter and John (Acts 3 and 4), Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13 and 15), Paul and Timothy and Barnabas with Mark (Acts 16 and 17), and others. It is the natural order, giving strength, poise and dignity to the mission. Luther had his Melancthon, the talents of one supplementing those of the other, as John seconded Peter, as Sankey seconded Moody in his work.

Very often the exigencies of foreign missions have necessitated loneliness like that of Damien in the early days at Molokai, but many of our missionary heroes are named in pairs and in groups, e. g., the Moffats, the Judsons, Stewart and his Lovedale associates.

In our Laymen's Movement and Every Member Canvass we have learned to revive Jesus' plan in doing all sorts of religious work. He believed in Team Work for the Kingdom. A Christian is seldom called to be a free lance.

2. An Authoritative Commission. Christ wished to impart to his helpers the confidence and fearlessness that are inspired by a mighty cause. He "spoke with authority," and he gave to them a charge to do the same. In another place he tells them not to be anxious in defending themselves but to regard themselves as the spokesmen of God. In St. Paul we see the mighty power that comes from an assured commission from on high. He was "an ambassador" from the King of kings, and all timidity and self-distrust vanished to plague him no more.

No one wants to hear a hesitant and equivocating preacher. No missionary should go forth uncommissioned. Indeed the ordination of his church, the charge from his denominational board, the prayers and supplications of his fellow members, are to him as voices of Christ, enduing him with spiritual power. It is no longer necessary for men to go without friends, without support from Christ's Church. Whether we teach a class, or go among the poor and ignorant to minister, or engage in personal work, we should go fearlessly, knowing whose we are and whom we serve.

3. Simplification of Personal Wants. It is always eminently fitting for Christians to live the simple life, and conspicuously so in the present need of mankind. But evangelists, missionaries, preachers must especially guard against even the appearance of self-indulgence, both for their own sakes and for the sake of those to whom they go. "Seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness" must be incarnated in them. Can you picture an anxious, worried, fussy person succeeding in winning a strange land to Christ? Or even winning a next door neighbor to trust in Him?

Jesus had nothing against good equipment. These men were simply going on a brief neighborhood trip. Later, he told them to prepare for changed conditions, and not to become vagabonds when he was gone (Luke 22:35). He did not want begging priests. Today, we may be sure, he would approve the shipment of printing presses, hospital supplies, and the means of civilized life to his apostles—all to be used for the blessing of men. But he does demand devoted lives dominated by a spiritual ideal.

4. Singleness of Mind. The conventionalities of Galilee called for endless formal social visits from house to house. Jesus commanded his disciples to make the first hospitable home their headquarters during their brief stay in a village, and to waste no time on useless distractions. He would not have the niceties of etiquette sap evangelistic energies. They had not gone forth to eat and to drink, but to publish the good news of the grace of God. Likewise he urged them to waste no energies upon fruitless localities when the whole world called. They were not to worry if rejected by some miserable town. Just shake off the dust and forget it. Go further. The story of Paul is a striking commentary on this teaching. No pioneer can afford to spend his time on hopeless propositions. He must do his work where it will count.

The Twofold Expression of the Evangel

Jesus always gave a double charge to his ambassadors. It is most concisely given in an old text of Luke 9:2, "He sent them forth to preach the kingdom of God and to heal." All missionaries have to remember this. They have a message to deliver and a ministry of helpfulness to fulfill. The two go hand in hand as in Jesus' life. We make a terrible mistake if we disparage social service and limit God's apostles to evangelism in any narrow sense. The records of our great missionaries are Christ-like in this respect. They have healed the sick, taught sanitation as well as worship; have emancipated women, unbound feet, fought against slavery and polygamy and alcohol, and striven for economic betterment and justice between man and man.

The Missionary's Furlough

Jesus not only believed that the laborer is worthy of his hire but also that even missionaries should have vacations. To be sure, they are often postponed and interrupted, as was Jesus' plan of "going apart to rest awhile" in our lesson text. But furloughs are necessary to the fullest usefulness of the workers, in order that they may confer together as did the twelve, in order that they may give an account of their endeavors to the people at home, and that the strain on mind and body may not break them down. Sometimes wonderful things may be accomplished by the missionary while he is on furlough at home. He may unexpectedly win precious recruits.

Young People's Topics for March 17

The Art of Living with Others

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. 1 Peter 3:8-16

A GREAT many books are published on the art of living and the science thereof. After all, science is an art and art is a science. The art of living is one thing as usually considered and the art of living with others is quite another. In most of the treatises on the art of living, the writers expend their energies in outlining ways of getting the most possible out of life just for ourselves. They emphasize the first person singular. The art of living with others, however, contemplates the placing of self in the background and puts the emphasis of its thought on the third person plural. Almost the first element of success in this art is courtesy. Courtesy, without fail, places the wishes or comfort of others before our own desires. Next in importance is kindness—kindness of act, of thought and of speech. Many a heart that wishes to be kind finds itself completely balked by a tongue which wishes to be smart and delights in satire. Therefore he who would live with others must "refrain his tongue from evil." Not only must the seeker for perfection in this art avoid doing evil to others, but he must avoid evil for himself; for no one can live successfully with others who carries into their company an evil reputation. Finally, he who would live well with others must avoid contention and must care little for his own way.

After all, there is no reason why we should have our way at the expense of another's will unless our way is so much better than his that argument to prove it is unnecessary. Many a friendship has been ruptured by an unnecessary argument which ended in personalities. Often indeed the tongue, being worsted, has called in the fist and finger-nail reserves, and often friendships have been torn asunder in a good old fashioned row. A contentious person is not fit to live with others; is in fact hardly good company for himself. It is not necessary to reply to every insinuation against us. If we are innocent of the accusation, the mere charge, although it annoys, will soon fall of its own weight, to the great discomfiture of the accuser. If we are guilty, no amount of denial or of contrary assertion will establish the fact of our innocence. Contention, therefore, is worse than useless, for it accomplishes no good, and is fruitful of evil. Simmered down, the art of living with others is the art of loving others better than ourselves.

Epworth League Topic. Eph. 4:11-16

either, for Paul never mentions popery. He discloses what he means when he says that "the Pope fulfils Paul's description in II Thess. 2:3-12." But here he is mistaken. The Pope's blasphemy and arrogance have been very great, but he has not yet opposed and exalted "himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped." His very title "vicar of Christ," disproves that. Nor does he, as God, sit "in the temple of God showing himself that he is God." The Vatican or St. Peter's at Rome is not the temple of God and is not called by that name. Roman Catholicism does not attach the word "temple" to its church buildings.

The temple Paul has in mind is the historic one in Jerusalem, which is to be rebuilt by the Jews in the latter end of this age. Our correspondent does not believe this, and affirms that "we have no Scriptural evidence that the temple ever will be rebuilt"; but in this he again errs, "not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God." He errs at still another point, when he takes exception to the remark in our article that the Antichrist has yet to appear. He quotes Paul's saying that "the mystery of iniquity" was already at work, as a proof that the Antichrist existed over 1,800 years ago. But "the mystery of iniquity" and the Antichrist are not one and the same; the Antichrist develops out of the mystery of iniquity, and the apostle himself testifies that the former had not been revealed in his day, but was yet to come (verse 8).

BUT why take such pains with this question? Is it merely to refute an opponent? By no means. Time is too short and space in the Christian Herald is too valuable for that. It is to make clear the teaching of Scripture on a very serious matter, and one that grows more and more serious as we "see the day approaching."

We may be mistaken indeed, but it looks to us like a case of spiritual camouflage. That French word has sprung into the limelight during the progress of this war, and we have come to learn that it means some kind of humbug for the deception of the enemy. A current illustration is the dictaphone. Quoting the Electrical Experimenter, the thing a commander is most interested to know is just when the enemy will leave his trenches to make an attack. That information might be obtained by dictaphones, but the question is, how are they to be placed in the enemy's trenches? The problem is supposed to be solved by properly "camouflaging" them, so that they will have a rather innocent appearance. In other words, let them be made up to look like cobblestones, or pieces of log or any other object that would not arouse the suspicion of the enemy.

In some such way as this, Satan is now acting with reference to the great move he is soon to make. That move is when he is cast out of heaven and down to this earth (Rev. 12:9-13), and will give "his power, and his seat, and great authority" to the beast (Rev. 13:2). In the meantime he would

As it rears and plunges over trenched and shell torn ground, the load which the motor must pull is terrific or negligible in rapid succession.

The spark plugs in that motor must be a rare combination of efficiency and durability—must exhibit unfailing dependability.

The world holds no finer example of utter dependability than Champion Spark Plugs which supply the spark of life for an overwhelming majority of all the gasoline motors in use in the world today.

It takes over a million Champions every ten working days to supply the world-wide demand for dependability in spark plugs.

divert our thought from the real beast by occupying it with a humbug. He would keep us from watching out against the greater enemy to come, by concentrating our attention upon the lesser enemy that now is.

TO speak plainly, the Papacy is an enemy of truth, and the Pope himself is no dim foreshadowing of the Antichrist, but that monster, when he arrives, will find his way prepared for him through Protestant Berlin as well as Catholic Rome. To quote Nietzsche, the great German philosopher, whose teaching is so largely responsible for this war: "While preparing to found a world-empire, Germany is also preparing to create a world-religion. No cultured European nation since the French Revolution has made any experiment in creative religion. . . . The present bent of mind at the universities among the most cultured is toward the religion of Valor, which speaks thus:

"You have heard how in old times, it was said, 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth'; but I say unto you, Blessed are the valiant, for they shall make earth their throne. Again it has been said, 'Blessed are the poor in spirit'; but I say unto you, Blessed are the great in soul, for they shall

Happy Endings

"WHY," I heard one girl question another, "do you always read the last chapter of a book first?"

The girl questioned hesitated before she answered.

"Because," she said at last, and quite honestly, "I hate unpleasant things. And if a book has an unhappy ending I won't trouble to read it!"

"That's awfully silly," said the first girl. "Some of the most splendid things ever written have had tragic endings." "I know it," sighed her companion, "but I don't want to be made unhappy by reading even great things. The world is too full of misery. I want to skim over it lightly so that I won't be badly hurt."

I, too, have a habit of reading the last chapter of a book before I legitimately reach it. I had never stopped before to reason out why I did it, and at the words of the second girl I found myself wondering whether we both had the same reason, and whether it was a worth-while one.

It's perfectly justifiable to want to avoid unhappiness. It's perfectly sane and logical to want to know only the sweetest and most laughter-filled corner of life. Sorrow and premature age go hand in hand, grief and joy seldom know each other. And yet—

I WENT to a house party not long ago and met there a dear little old lady with fluffy white hair and sad eyes; a little old lady who had known the pangs of parting and sacrifice, who had loved and lost. And she said to me, with a wonderful seeing look in her eyes:

"I wouldn't give up one of the sorrows that I have had to bear! I wouldn't give up one of them! They've been part of my very life."

DID you ever, when you were small, go to some seaside place? And, sitting happily in the sand, did you ever dig the foundations of a wonderful castle o' dreams? I have.

I remember, once, that I planned to dig a specially pretentious castle. It was to have a moat and a drawbridge and a turret; it was to be as grand as a castle of sand could be. And I dug down, with a will until I reached sand that was first sticky, and then very damp, and then at last really wet. Then I saw that my castle would have a pool of water for its foundation unless I stopped digging.

My mother was sitting not far from me, on the sand. I hurried to her side. "There's water underneath!" I told her.

Mother looked up from her sewing. "Of course there is," she said.

"How," I questioned resentfully, "can I make a real castle, when I can't dig down without coming to water?"

"No one," answered my mother, "ever digs far into the sand without coming to water!"

enter into Valhalla. And ye have heard men say, 'Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God'; but I say unto you, Blessed are the warmakers, for they shall be called—if not the children of Jahve (Jehovah) the children of Odin, who is greater than Jahve (Jehovah)!"

If such "bent of mind" were limited to Germany, we might not seriously fear; but the philosophical and religious teaching which underlies it is rife in every nation of Christendom, including our own. Our colleges and universities are permeated with it, and our pulpits in many cases are its mouthpiece. By such philosophic and religious teaching is meant that which ignores, or questions, or outrightly opposes the Bible as the revealed will of the only true God, the incarnation and essential deity of Jesus Christ, his impeccable humanity and the infinite value of his atoning sacrifice for the salvation of sinful and lost men.

This is what is true in Protestantism today, and has been true for a long while; and it is laying the ground and preparing the way for the real Antichrist, who is yet to come, and whose description and history were given in the earlier article which elicited the above remarks.

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

It's easy I fancy, to skim over things lightly without ever getting below the dry sand of life. Many people do. Many of them, after a peep at the last chapter, go on to another less wonderful story because the ending of the first one isn't happy. But they aren't getting as much out of life as they imagine. For one cannot go down deeply into life without finding grief, any more than one can dig down deeply into the sand without finding water!

I saw a man, a very old man, yesterday. His hair and his beard were white and his shoulders were bent. But I noticed that his face, when I drew near to him, was curiously unlined.

"Somehow," I said to my companion, "that man's face doesn't match the rest of him. Somehow he seems a bit wrong. He has the forehead of a child."

"Probably," answered my companion, "he has the mind of a child, too, and the reasoning power of a child. A face with no lines on it, an old face, is not particularly desirable. It isn't only sorrow that leaves its mark. Thought and deep feeling and sympathy leave their lines, too!"

IN this time of trouble, one must try not to go too lightly along. We need laughter and song now more than we ever did; but there are those of us who need help, too, and comfort and sympathy. While there is a war going on, a too light-hearted attitude is sometimes a bit unkind, and laughter—too much of it—may be thoughtless.

This is a time when the book of life must be read even though some of the chapters may have unpleasant endings. For the book of life is being filled with more history than ever before, and there aren't as many pages being left now for songs and light-hearted verse. We who want to leave it unread because we fear the hurt of it, must remember that others are being hurt, too.

IF the Christ-child, grown to a man, had been afraid to read His book that ended in victory only through the agony of the cross—afraid because of the suffering and the tears that were crowded into the chapter of Gethsemane and Calvary—the great story of Christianity would have gone unwritten, unread, un-lived. If others had been willing to skim lightly over life, this same wonderful story would have died in its infancy. But they were not afraid. They walked bravely through life, some walked bravely to death.

And if we are afraid to face the suffering and want that are going on all over the world during this time of war, we shall not be able to help. We should sing and laugh and do our bit of smiling; but we must dare, at this same time, to dig deeply under the dry sand of life, despite the sorrow. We must dare to go on bravely reading, even though we fear that the reading may hurt us.

Wonderful War-Time Building

food and all sorts of supplies have to be kept until they can be sent off to Europe.

The buildings are different from those of the cantonments, and the structures here at Washington which I have described. They have to be carefully built and with special regard to their use. Those going up near New York will cost more than has been expended upon all these new buildings at the National Capital. The amount will be $8,000,000, and that single unit will have more than one mile of piers and bulkheads. The structures will cover more than two hundred acres. There will be 250 of them, and they will range in size from mere sheds to great warehouses.

ANOTHER great branch of building construction is in connection with the housing problem. The truth is there is no shortage of labor in the United States, but there is a great shortage of housing facilities in the industrial centers where the war work is done. This has to be remedied, and Uncle Sam will soon have under way a large number of industrial cities. One of these already arranged for will cost $35,000,000. It will be built for the emergency shipyard at Hog Island near Philadelphia. Another will be created near Newport News, and others will probably be built at sixty or seventy places, scattered here and there over the country. These cities will be laid out after the best of modern civic planning and they will continue to exist after the war is over as model industrial centers. Great Britain has already put more than $500,000,000 into such buildings, and it is said that she will have to spend at least a half billion dollars more.

Of somewhat the same nature are the new buildings planned for the rapidly increasing clerical force here at Washington. The city is now overcrowded and 20,000 more clerks will be added this year. The Council of National Defense has been asked to make immediate plans for buildings that will take care of these clerks.

AND now let me say a word about the cantonment cities which Uncle Sam has already constructed. They have been built and paid for. Their cost was just about $134,000,000, and that was $16,000,000 less than the amount Congress appropriated for their construction.

The military cities had to be erected in different parts of the country and under all sorts of physical conditions. In some places the ground was flat, in others hilly and in others it had to be drained. The speed with which these cities were erected has never been equaled. At Camp Devens, Mass., for instance, the 1,728 buildings making up the cantonment city were erected at the average rate of forty minutes per building. The whole city was constructed within eleven weeks. Twenty portable sawmills cut the lumber at the site to save hand sawing. The 20,000 doors and 70,000 windows required were made in mills throughout the country. In addition to the quarters for the men, the structures included 20 administration buildings, 55 storehouses and 331 stables. During the job 135 motor trucks and 200 wagons were used, and the work was so mobilized that lumber was shifted from the cars to the mill at the rate of one-half million feet per day and carted by trucks from the machines to the buildings where it was needed.

THE organization and plans for all of this work, and also for other great building schemes which the government has now under way were created through the Committee on Emergency Construction of the Council of National Defense. In order to give you some idea of these great undertakings and how they have been carried out I have had a talk with Major W. A. Starrett, the chairman of that committee. Major Starrett is one of the chief industrial officers of Uncle Sam's great labor army. A leading architect of New York City at the time the war broke out, he has been accustomed to dealing with large contracts. The first subject that came before the committee was the cantonments. In reply to my questions regarding this, Major Starrett said:

"The problem was staggering. The government had to provide thirty-two great military cities and build them from the ground up. It had to gather the building materials from widely scattered parts of the United States, transport them to the places where they were needed and create the organization and plans for doing the work. Congress had decided to appropriate $150,000,000 for the purpose, and this vast sum of money must be efficiently and economically spent. The committee had to organize the working forces, and it needed the very best men of the country; for the job had to be done within a short space of time. The first thing was to make the contracts and plans."

MAJOR STARRETT showed me one of the contracts. It is a printed pamphlet of only eleven pages, but it has served for the expenditure of more than $134,000,000, and it covers all the conditions of construction of these thirty-two cities. The building has been done without any dispute to speak of, and that at a cost far less than the average amount which the public pays for such work. The ordinary charge for the superintendence and erection of buildings is 8 and 10 per cent. of the cost. By this contract 10 per cent. could be charged only up to $100,000, and after that the fees grew smaller as the amount involved rose. In no case could they exceed $250,000, and this notwithstanding that the estimated cost of some of the cities was more than $9,000,000, and the actual cost ran above that amount.

When the cantonments were built it was found that the average fee, instead of being 8 per cent., or 10 per cent., was just about 2.98 per cent., and this notwithstanding no charges for overhead were included. In many cases the contracting firms undertook the work largely on the grounds of patriotism and to show that they could do quickly the biggest jobs Uncle Sam had on hand.

I WAS interested as to how the contracts were let. The building was such that it could not be given out on competitive bids, and Uncle Sam wanted only the best men in the country to have charge of it. To make the selection the Council of National Defense sent out inquiries to the different parts of the United States as to the most honest, experienced and ablest men who were doing big jobs of this kind. The men finally selected were proud that they were called upon to do the work, and almost no disputes have arisen regarding the contracts. The question of labor was fixed by taking union prices and union rules of each locality and going by them. There were no strikes of consequence, and that notwithstanding as many as 160,000 men were working on these cantonment cities at the same time.

In addition to these cantonment cities Uncle Sam has built a number of great aviation camps for the Signal Corps. The latter have cost over $21,000,000.

The new buildings at Washington which I have described were planned under the direction of Major Starrett and his committee, and the great storage buildings for supplies and ammunition have come under the province of that committee, and were the result of the great work done by the storage committee of the Council of National Defense. reserve, and that, at best, the life of a plane was not over two months. Also for each plane in active service, forty-six men are required for ground work, handling, repairing, tuning up, etc.

Coincident with this came a report from a correspondent in France, that control of the air over the American sector was now held by the enemy. While this dispatch got by the censor, it was not officially confirmed.

THE RAILROAD BILL. The Administration bill providing for National operation of the Railways during the war and for eighteen months thereafter passed the Senate on February 22; the House was expected to vote within a week. As passed by the Senate the bill gives the President power to do anything that may be necessary to make the roads serve the national emergency. Rates may be made subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission and arrangements for compensation for the use of the roads, to be based on average net returns for the years 1915, 1916 and 1917, are also to be subject to review by the Commission and to appeal from its decision to the Court of Claims. Short line railroads, which Director General McAdoo did not consider essential to Government operation, are included in the roads to be operated under the new law.

FOOD CRISIS NEAR. Food Administrator Hoover announced on February 21 that unless immediate and drastic embargoes were laid against other merchandise in order to clear the rails for the movement of food to interior terminals and the seaboard we would be unable to keep our agreements as to the rationing of our Allies and a food shortage in the Eastern States would result within sixty days. Director General of Railroads, McAdoo, replied that if Mr. Hoover would advise him of the location of foodstuffs and their destination the railroads would not fail.

MOVING THE GOODS. The warm weather of the 2nd and 3rd weeks in February enabled the railways of the country to make a concerted attack upon the accumulation of freight on sidings and in terminals. As a result the number of stalled cars on February 19 was only 89,774 as against 160,904 on February 6. The British government by rearrangement of schedules and rerouting of ships had, during the same time, provided so many cargo vessels that the former accumulation of foodstuffs was not only cleaned up, but on February 20 ships were actually waiting at eastern ports for wheat and other foodstuffs still in transit.

WHEAT AT $2.50. The House Agricultural Committee, on February 18, completed the food conservation bill. It was reported that the blanket authority asked for by Food Administrator Hoover had been withheld, and that the bill would confer upon the President specific authority for the control of the manufacture and distribution of foodstuffs and all public eating-houses. The Senate Agricultural Committee on the same day was advised by C. H. Hyde of the Oklahoma State Council of Defense that unless production was increased, wheatless weeks were imminent, instead of merely wheatless days. The committee ordered a favorable report, on February 19, on the bill by Senator Gore, fixing the price for the 1918 wheat crop at $2.50 a bushel. President Wilson and Food Administrator Hoover were reported as opposed to the legislative fixing of such a price at this time, the President, by proclamation on February 23, continuing for 1918 the 1917 price of $2.20.

ZULULAND FLOODED. According to press dispatches of February 18 floods in the Unvolosi River Valley in the sugar district of Zululand, following a terrific storm, had destroyed the railroad bridge at Mazude, Zululand; 300 persons had been drowned, while villages and plantations had been destroyed.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The new British suffrage law increased the number of persons entitled to vote in Great Britain by 8,000,000, of whom 6,000,000 are women over thirty years of age, who will constitute about two-fifths of the whole number of voters. . . . The Department of Agriculture is making plans for the trying out of women as farm laborers. . . . Fire in the Salvation Army barracks at 124-130 W. 14th St., New York City, on February 21, drove 115 persons from the building and took the lives of two young men, student officers, preparing for work in France.

Progress of the War

IT should now be comparatively safe for any man, Samaritan or otherwise, to travel the Jericho road; for, on February 21, Jericho, the Jordan country south of it and the highroad to Jerusalem were firmly in British hands, after a three-day action by Australian troops under General Allenby, across a difficult country and through heavy rainstorms. The total advance was in the neighborhood of 8 miles. Meantime other British forces advancing over a wide front north of the city of Jerusalem penetrated 3 to 4 miles behind the Turkish positions. The British front from Joppa to the Jordan measures about sixty miles.

For another week the action on the Italian front and the western front from Switzerland to the sea has been confined largely to artillery battles, which have become more and more intense with better fighting weather. Vigorous trench raiding has also been indulged in by both sides, and there have been many air raids, French and British planes bombing railway junctions and concentration points behind the German line, while Italian aviators on February 21 bombarded the railway station and troops in transit at Innsbruck in the Austrian Tyrol. The Germans three times raided Lonon on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday nights, February 16, 17 and 18. The third attack was futile, being driven off by the defenders. In the other two, 27 persons were killed and 41 injured.

The Germans made a determined attempt on February 19 to recapture the trenches taken by the French, with American aid, on February 13, southeast of Tahure. Enemy forces succeeded in occupying temporarily certain elements of the trench system, from which they were later driven out, taking 125 prisoners back with them.

The French troops on February 20 entered the German positions over a large front in Lorraine north of Berus northeast of Nancy. The French returned with more than 400 prisoners.

American forces appeared on another portion of the front on February 22, when in a fight between patrols, on the Chemin-des-Dames in the Aisne sector, American troops killed one German and captured one, returning with one man slightly wounded.

Submarine sinkings for the week of British merchantmen were 12 of over 1,600 tons, 3 under that tonnage, and one fisherman. No French ships were sunk.

The announcement that Gen. Sir Wm. Robertson had resigned as British Chief of Staff was somewhat qualified on February 17 when it appeared that he had been given his choice between the position as British representative on the Supreme Allied War Council or the position of Chief of Staff with somewhat diminished powers. He chose neither, and he was therefore succeeded as Chief of Staff by Gen. Sir Henry Wilson.

A German submarine on February 17 bombarded the British Channel port of Dover but was driven off by shore batteries after firing about 30 shots. One shot destroyed a home, killing one child, and injuring 3 men, 1 woman and 3 children.

It was reported on February 20 that, according to the latest figures received at American army headquarters, 204 Americans lost their lives on the Tuscania. Of this total there had been identified and buried 3 officers and 137 men; unidentified buried, 1 officer and 31 men, and 32 men were missing.

Salt Mackerel

Direct from the Fishing Boats to You

Old Gloucester

Your pail is ready—fat, meaty, juicy mackerel—send no money—try the fish first.

Frank E. Davis PRESIDENT

It's thirty-three years, come next September, since I began supplying the choicest of Gloucester's famous mackerel direct to the homes of families throughout the country.

Our Own Home Kind

People here in Gloucester, the leading fish port of America, laughed at me when I began to sell mackerel by mail. They didn't realize how hard it is for other people to get good fish. But I did. So I decided to make it easy for everybody, everywhere, to have full-flavored, wholesome fish, the kind we pick for our own eating here at Gloucester. 65,000 families are buying from us today.

Fishmen for Generations

You see, I know fish. My folks, 'way back, have always been fishermen. They helped round Gloucester in 1623. My boyhood days were spent aboard fishing boats. Catching fish, knowing the choicest and picking 'em out, cleaning and curing them the right way, has been my life's job.

Thirty Years' Development

Today our business is housed in a modern, four-story, concrete building, with 20,000 square feet of floor space; fitted with the most improved and sanitary equipment for cleaning and packing fish. Standing at the water's edge, the fishermen's catches are brought right into the building. They go to your table with "the tang of the sea" in them.

Such a Good Breakfast!

A fat, tender, juicy Davis' Mackerel broiled to a sizzling brown; some butter, a sprinkling of pepper, a touch of lemon, if you wish—how good it smells, how tempting it looks, how it tickles the palate, and, oh, how it satisfies—the favorite breakfast dish of thousands.

Fall Mackerel, Fat and Tender

Most of the fish your dealer can buy are Spring fish, thin, dry, and tasteless. What I've selected for you are Fall fish, juicy and fat with the true salty-sea mackerel flavor. We clean and wash them before weighing. You pay only for net weight. No heads and no tails. Just the white, thick, meaty portions—the parts that make the most delicious meal imaginable. You probably have never tasted salt mackerel as good as mine.

Send No Cash Try the Mackerel First

I want you to know before you pay that my fish will please you. If there is any possibility of a risk, I want it to be at my expense. Just mail the coupon today, and I'll ship at once a pail of my mackerel containing 9 fish, each fish more than sufficient for 4 people, all charges prepaid, so that your family can have a real Gloucester treat Sunday morning. Then—if my mackerel are not better than any you have ever tasted, send back the rest at my expense.

If you are pleased with them—and I'm sure you will be—send me $4.50 and at the same time ask for "Descriptive List of Davis' Fish," sold only direct, never to dealers.

Remember: Meat, flour, potatoes, everything has gone 'way up in price. In comparison, Davis' mackerel is low. An economical food—so good to eat, so nutritious! The "Sea Food Cook Book" that goes with the fish will tell you just how to prepare them.

Mail the coupon now with your business card, letter-head or reference.

Frank E. Davis Co.

325 Central Wharf Gloucester Mass.

Frank E. Davis Co., 325 Central Wharf, Gloucester, Mass.

Without obligation please send me, all charges prepaid, a pail of Davis' Mackerel—to contain 9 fish, each fish more than sufficient for 4 people. I agree to return $4.50 in ten days or return the fish.

Last day for mailing or bringing in your set of answers in the National Bible Picture Study will be

MAY 31, 1918

First day for mailing or bringing in your set of answers in the National Bible Picture Study will be

APRIL 23, 1918

APRIL 22, 1918

We publish the last of the 30 pictures today, but do not think that this means the end of the Picture Study—far from it! Notice that you have until May 31 to work out your answers and submit them. Notice, too, that you cannot submit any sets at all until April 23 at the earliest—that is so all will put in ample time on the final pictures. No orders for Outfits will be filled unless they are mailed by April 22 at the latest. Hurry and send your order now—you have nearly three months in which to compete at your leisure!

Our desire is to bring as many as possible into the wonderful Study, and so we have worked out a 6-months' offer for all our friends—old and new ones—including the Outfit with it at the usual additional price of 10 cents. The offer—and it will be a popular one—is for the Christian Herald for 6 months, new subscription, or renewal or extension of a present subscription, with the complete Bible Picture Study Outfit and all the 30 pictures, for $1.10.

You do a friend a great kindness in introducing this study, so rich in spiritual reward.

What the Study Is

The National Bible Picture Study consists of fitting suitable Bible verses to the 30 pictures. Your pleasant task will be to read through the 2,000 Bible verses, which are conveniently republished in the official Reference Book, International Bible Readings, and pick out the verses which in your opinion are best illustrated by the pictures. Then you will write your selections down in the Answer Book, and send it in to us, with your name and address. A committee of eminent Judges will designate which, among the verses submitted, really fit the pictures best, and the 1,001 participants who submit the best lists of these verses will be given the 1,001 cash rewards, aggregating $5,000.00, and starting with a first prize of $1,000.00 cash. Competition without expense is made possible by the rules, which are free upon request. Below we show the four offers we make in connection with the complete Study Outfit.

Picture No. 30

The Complete Study Outfit

The Reference Book, International Bible Readings, contains the 2,000 Bible verses from which you will select the best verses for the 30 pictures. No one need look through the 31,101 verses in the whole Bible—in fact, every participant must confine his or her selections to those 2,000 verses republished in International Bible Readings.

In the Answer Book you write down and submit the verses you select as best fitting the 30 pictures. It consists of 30 blank pages, on which to write the verses.

International Bible Readings and the Answer Book, with the complete series of 30 pictures, make up the complete Study Outfit.

All participants compete on equal terms, no matter what the date of beginning the Study, and there is no reason why you should not gain a large cash reward, in addition to your sure prize of priceless Bible knowledge and understanding. You have until May 31 to compete!

Palestine Fighting Famine

THE long-awaited opportunity for relief in Palestine has arrived," writes Chairman Trowbridge from Cairo to the American Committee for Syrian and Armenian Relief. "Sickness and destitution are serious, especially in the cities. I estimate that fifty thousand sufferers are directly accessible. Bishop MacInnes's committee is well organized, with representatives already in Palestine, but funds in hand are very inadequate. The refugee hospital established near Gaza is crowded, and three more are required. Seed, grain, clothing and medical supplies can be secured in Egypt for Palestine relief. British military authorities offer all possible transportation facilities and urge immediate action. We recommend your granting sixteen thousand dollars monthly to the MacInnes Committee. Fox, manager American Red Cross, Cairo, is sharing the responsibility. Conditions in Syria are appalling."

In a letter dated January 8, Mr. Trowbridge says: "Three members of our staff are granted passes to Jaffa. Probably twenty thousand are destitute in Jerusalem. Three hundred tons of rice is being forwarded from Cairo. Medical relief is being established; our five doctors are working incessantly. Will you cable funds monthly? Twenty-three Armenian exiles reached Port Said after inconceivable sufferings. They have wandered two and a half years from a village near Caesarea through the Asia Minor mountains and Arabian deserts. Two hundred and twenty-seven perished en route."

ADVICES from consuls and relief workers in the district about Tiflis are that the condition of refugees is most critical and the responsibility is almost entirely on the American committee. The problem is more difficult from the unsettled internal conditions. New workers have made possible large extensions. Partridge, Compton and Orvis are at Alexandropol with 41,000 refugees. Elmer is greatly enlarging the work at Etchmiadzin, where there are 10,000 refugees, and hopes to start a new center at Ashdarag with 10,000 refugees. White is in Erivan in industrial work, James is feeding 15,000 in Novobayazid and Aekhta, where prompt help must be given to save the people from death by starvation. Williams is located at Van and reports terrible need of relief for 20,000 refugees. Heald at St. Gamarloo and Kirk at Bullak are in industrial work and food distribution among 15,000 refugees. Reynolds begs more for individual relief. The Home Orphan Department is taking on 3,000 more children in Erivan province, 1,000 at Kars, and 1,000 at Van. Other districts, not yet touched, must soon reach 20,000. The committee is besieged by appeals from all districts. Delegations of hungry people, often numbering hundreds, come long distances begging for bread and refuse to leave without food or promises.

THE American Committee has to assume the work hitherto borne by the Russian government and Armenian organizations. Unless this is done promptly, numerous orphanages caring for about 10,000 children, and many asylums for old people, will have to close, leaving the inmates homeless and destitute.

The Persian government urgently requests more help for refugees. The grants were soon exhausted and available supplies are rapidly disappearing. Wheat is ten dollars a bushel. Winter is increasing the suffering. Funds are needed immediately to save starving thousands.

Richards writes from Western Persia as follows: "The food situation is desperate here now, and with it has come the inevitable sickness and death. More fresh refugees are coming into Urumia and the villages near by, and there is not nearly enough food to feed the people already here. By the time you get this letter the conditions will be frightful, and the people will be dying like sheep."

CONDITIONS in Central Persia are indicated by this cablegram from Douglas at Teheran: "The distress is appalling throughout the district. Almost any amount could be used for general relief. Drought prevented crops. Locusts and foreign troops have eaten the remainder. Great Moslem populations everywhere are starving. Scores are dying. Distressing appeals come from all the cities. The country is impoverished. The only hope is in American liberality."

U. S. Minister Caldwell at Teheran has reported to the State Department that beggars multiply and hundreds swarm the streets, pitifully crying and begging, and at times in their desperation assaulting the besieged. Similar conditions are reported from all parts, provinces and cities of Persia.

To the Presbyterian Board has come the following cable from Teheran: "Forty thousand destitute in Teheran alone. People eating dead animals. Women abandoning infants. Esselstyn feeding 1,200 daily at Neshed. Only limitation is lack of money. Need $100,000 additional for March."

CHRISTIAN Greeks in large numbers have been deported from their homes along the Black Sea coast, suffering and many of them dying from hunger, exposure, hardship and resultant diseases. Many thousands of them have escaped to Trebizond, within the Russian lines, where they are now ministered to by our relief agents. It is estimated that a quarter of a million Greek refugees from Asia Minor are now in Thrace, Macedonia and Greece proper, where they are practically homeless and in urgent need of food and clothing.

An American consul in Asia Minor cables: "The 120,000 or so dependent persons in my consular area have no other resources for bread, and once the relief (from America) stops, these people will disappear from the face of the earth."

There is no room for question as to the honesty and effectiveness of relief distribution in Asia Minor. All authorities agree in substance with the typical statements of two American consuls, who affirm: "Every dollar which is contributed for the relief of suffering Armenians and other Christian people in the Turkish Empire will reach the persons for whom it is intended, and no part of such funds will fall into the hands of others."

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

ON January 19 the Memphis Noon Prayer Meeting celebrated its fourth anniversary, which happened also to be the hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Robert E. Lee, which it has been the custom of the Prayer Meeting to celebrate annually. In spite of a severe snowstorm and blizzard, about 100 people attended, and an old member said it was the greatest meeting he had ever attended. A successful business man and city missionary testified that four years before he had been a "down-and-out bum." One day he was passing the church and noticed the sign, "Come in, rest and pray." He says he didn't simply make a resolution; he made a revolution, and he couldn't have done it all by himself. Another business man testified that he had never made much more than a mere living until he came in touch with the Noon Prayer Meeting and put his business in the Lord's hands. Then he found the truth of the promise: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." The Noon Prayer Meeting does not forget the faithful workers who occupy what some would call from a worldly point of view a more humble station. The pastor presented the colored janitor with an offering in appreciation of his serving of meals and his leading many to Christ as they worked with him in the kitchen.

A member of the Prayer League in a recent letter suggested that we form a Prayer League Fund to which each member of the League should contribute according to his ability each month, she herself suggesting that she was willing to give a dollar a month, the money so raised to go to the Bowery Mission. From its inception the Prayer League has been kept entirely free of any financial entanglement. The Bowery Mission is doing a good work, and every dollar it gets is put to good use; but we do not wish the members of the Prayer League to feel that their membership is in any way based upon their ability to pay. The Prayer League is essentially a band of sincere believers who meet to unite their petitions for the salvation of souls and the good of the coming Kingdom. If the salvation of souls includes the remedying of physical ills and the supplying of material needs, those also are included in the objects of the League. The editors do not see any way in which a financial obligation could be coupled with the purposes of the Prayer League without impairing these purposes and weakening its power. We shall be glad, however, to welcome any member of the League as one of the faithful band of earnest souls whose gifts make possible the work of the Bowery Mission.

Mrs. E. S. thanks and praises God for answered prayer for one who had wandered away from Him into ways of grievous sin.

Mrs. E. A. S. praises God for restoration of the eyesight of a dear grandson. She asks prayer for a daughter who must go through an operation and for bodily and spiritual strength for herself.

Mrs. J. F. W. acknowledges answer to prayer for the well-being of a son who was in a military hospital and asks grace to be able and willing to give her son to the service of his country in its hour of trial. She asks prayer for the mental healing of a sister and child, and that an operation may be avoided.

Z. C. B., of China, asks some reader or readers of the Prayer League column to take Mr. Tseh, of Hohow, China, as their substitute on the mission field, and to help him with their prayers and their financial aid. He is doing a great work and fifty-three converts have been baptized on his circuit this year.

G. W. H. K., after threescore and eighteen years, or 28,470 days, of his life have come and gone, praises God in a beautiful prayer which he sends to the League, in which he says: "Surely goodness and mercy have followed me during all this period. I acknowledge every blessing that has come to me as a gift from the bountiful Father, to whom I give praise and thanks."

F. H. B. asks the prayers of the League that wife's eyesight be strengthened, that she be relieved of trouble in hands and feet, and that she be cured of salt-rheum.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Walnut, Neb.; Johnson, Wash.; Nashville, Tenn.; Sandborn, Ind.; Clearwater, Fla.; Cuero, Texas; Wendell, Idaho; Carlisle, Ky.; Clear Lake, S. D.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Elm City, N. C.; New Britain, Conn.; Laurel, Md.; Hartford, Conn.; Huntington, W. Va.; Paden City, W. Va.; Seymour, Conn. (for nationwide prohibition); Chicago, Ill. (that Billy Sunday's campaign may be successful); South Jacksonville, Fla. (that many may be saved during revival); Defiance, Ohio (at Mount Zion Church); D. H. (for deepening spiritual interest in this country).

Mrs. B. C. and Mrs. B. G. M. ask prayer that husbands' minds may be restored; three parents, that daughters' minds may be restored; J. C. G. that brother's mind may be restored; five friends, that minds may be strengthened; eight, for mental restoration for relatives and friends.

Rev. H. P. L. asks prayer that sight of left eye may be restored; Mrs. C. M. R., that son's sight may be restored; A Mother, that husband's sight may be restored; three friends, that mothers' sight may be restored; J. T., that wife's sight may be restored; thirteen friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives and friends.

Thirteen friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for friends, relatives and themselves.

Eight friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Fifty-five friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Four parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. O. C. F., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; seven friends, that friends and relatives may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. W. D. P., that son may be cured of the morphine habit; seven friends, that friends and relatives may be cured of the tobacco habit.

One hundred and twenty-one friends ask prayer for healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. E. A. B., that husband may be cured of cancer; Mrs. E. G. M., that son may be cured without an operation; E. B., that sister may be cured of tumors without an operation.

Thirty-three parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty-three wives, their husbands; fifty-two friends, for the conversion of relatives or friends.

Thirty-six friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Fifty-four friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including twenty-three friends asking prayer for peace.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

M. V. L., Pleasantville, Pa.; M. N. H., Stevensville, Mich.; Mrs. A. G., Traverse City, Mich.; Mrs. C. W., Oil City, Pa.; Mrs. M. J. V., Bushnell, Ill.; Mrs. B., Lisbon, N. H.; L. J. F., Pittsburg, Pa.; H. M. P., Dundas, Ill.; L. M. W., Maryville, Tenn.; S. T., Brashear, Texas; E. B. C., Nottawa, Mich.; S. A. M., Elmira, N. Y.; J. B. H., Lancaster, Pa.; W. S. H., West Virginia; M. E., Urbana, Ohio; Miss J. F. W., Harlan, Iowa; Mrs. M. E., Carrollton, Ohio; Mrs. M. R. B., Remington, Va.; V. M., Savannah, Ga.; Mrs. A. M., Falsen, N. D.; Mrs. C. E. W., Columbus, Kan.; J. T. M., Philadelphia, Pa.; Mrs. W. H. P., Suffield, Conn.; Mrs. J. F. H., Trenton, N. J.; M. A. B., Hale, Mo.; A Friend, Elizabeth, N. J.; Mrs. G. W., Wilmington, N. C.; E. "Since McCormick invented a reaping machine, no other invention has been so beneficial to farmers as the automobile."

And when it comes to farmers' wives, what compares with the automobile?

The fact that farmers have bought 60 per cent of the cars we have built, we consider the greatest evidence of their value.

For farmers, above all other business men, need and look for those qualities of performance on which Overland supremacy is founded—efficiency, dependability and economy.

Farmers particularly need the room and riding comfort of the Overland.

Farmers' wives tell us of their appreciation of the style distinction of the Overland.

These Overland qualities are of even greater importance today when time and energy are demanded on the farm as never before.

So now while thousands of other farmers and their families are saving time, energy and money with this Overland Thrift Car—

We suggest that you let the Willys-Overland Dealer show you how this same Model 90 will earn its way for you.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

Petrograd. The Admiralty Building, and across the Neva the University

RUSSIA'S acceptance of Germany's peace terms changed the face of Europe. It cut off from Russia 160,000 square miles of territory and 20,000,000 population, and pushed her back from the Baltic, leaving her helpless and impotent, economically and physically, and burdened with an indemnity of $1,500,000,000 to the Central Powers.

Despite this surrender, the German forces relentlessly swept forward to take Petrograd, yet not only met with strong resistance, but were overtaken by a command from Berlin to halt.

The newest German demands had included the policing of all the principal cities of Russia. The advance was along all possible lines of invasion, from Reval, where the Gulf of Finland and the Baltic Sea had been opened, through Lithuania, Poland, Ukraine and the Cossack countries to the Black Sea, and across in Asia Minor, where the Turks had retaken Trebizond, and even in far eastern Siberia, where a German garrison of former prisoners of war was established at Irkutsk.

The Russian people were not submitting without a tremendous struggle. The demoralized and demobilizing army had been replaced by the Red Guard of resistance, and at Reval, Pskov, Kolenkowitz and elsewhere fierce opposition was made to the German advance, while people of all classes were called out at midnight and set to digging trenches for the defense of Petrograd. When the invading forces were within eight hours of Petrograd, the American, Japanese, Chinese and Siamese embassies, altogether some 150 persons, left the invested capital by special train for the east. Arrangements were made to move the Americans in Moscow to Samara, 500 miles eastward.

THE German offensive, under the command of General Hoffman, began two hours after the armistice expired, at the important city of Dvinsk, which was taken without a struggle. The town and fortress of Reval, capital of Esthonia and commanding the Gulf of Finland, were occupied after a battle. Pskov was taken, but the Russians rallied and there was street fighting for several days. Pskov was the headquarters of the Northern Russian Army. It is about 160 miles southwest of Petrograd. Advances rapidly followed to Pernau, where the Estonian Battalion enlisted, to Dorpat, where 3,000 prisoners and many hundreds of automobiles were taken, and, south of the Pinsk Marshes, to Rovno, at which latter place the whole staff of the Russian special army fell into German hands. At Zhitomir, about one hundred miles east of Rovno, contact was established with Ukrainian troops. Near Kolenkowitz Russian forces threw themselves against detachments which were pressing forward into the Ukraine along the Pripet, but were thrown back by a sharp attack, and the town and railway station were taken by storm. Within a few days the troops of General von Linsingen's army group covered more than 186 miles on foot, by rail, and in motor cars. According to reports from Arensburg, 20,000 German troops refused to attack their former enemies.

GENERAL COUNT MIRBACH, commanding the armies occupying Esthonia and Livonia, issued a manifesto to the population declaring that they were now under German police power. He ordered the release from prison of all barons of Esthonia, declaring they are under the protection of Germany. The Bolsheviks had arrested and imprisoned many German nobles and business men, seizing their property.

It was reported from Petrograd that the Germans were executing Red Guards, treating them as outlaws, but releasing and disarming soldiers of the regular army. Berlin advices received in Amsterdam, as forwarded by the Central News, reported that a state of siege had been proclaimed "in consequence of events in Poland" at Czenstochowa, Lodz and Wloclawek, important towns in Western Poland.

The Japanese, according to certain reports on February 27, intended to take action in Siberia at an early date. The situation in Siberia was then considered extremely grave, owing to the inability of the Cossack General Semenoff, head of the anti-Bolshevik movement in that vast territory, to secure Allied support, for which he had appealed to the Japanese.

Japan has addressed the Allied Powers and the United States urging them to join in military operations in Siberia, to save the vast stores of war supplies held there and along the Siberian railroad. These are largely of American and Japanese manufacture, and have accumulated enormously, owing to the lack of transportation facilities. Japan's desire is to prevent them from falling into German hands, and to accomplish this she is ready to take military action, in cooperation with Allied and American forces. The United States has some 20,000 troops in the Philippines and considerable naval strength in Asiatic waters. No decision had yet been reached at this writing.

The peace terms submitted to Russia at the Brest-Litovsk conference by the Central Powers are now stated to have been as follows: "Russia should surrender 160,000 square miles of territory, having a population of 18,000,000, and pay an indemnity of about $1,500,000,000. The Central Powers were prepared to return to Russia 7,000 square miles in the Grodno Government, Province of Lithuania. Russia should agree not to spread revolutionary propaganda in the Central Empires. The commercial treaty which was abrogated at the beginning of the war should be reconstituted and extended thirty years."

The approximate area of Lithuania and Poland is about 161,000 square miles, and the population in 1915 was approximately 25,500,000. Of the total population Poland contributed nearly half, but it must now be much less than that.

CHANCELLOR VON HERTLING, in a speech before the Reichstag on February 25, declared the German attitude in Russia as follows:

"After the breaking off of peace negotiations by the Russian delegation February 10, we had a free hand as against Russia. The sole aim of the advance of our troops, which was begun seven days after the rupture, was to safeguard the fruits of our peace with the Ukraine.

"Aims of conquest were in no way a determining factor. We were strengthened in this by the Ukrainians' appeal for support in bringing about order in their young state against the disturbances carried out by the Bolsheviks.

"If further military operations in other regions have taken place, the same applies to them. They in no way aim at conquest. They are solely taking place at the urgent appeals and representations of the populations for protection against atrocities and devastation by Red Guards and other bands.

"They have therefore been undertaken in the name of humanity. They are measures of assistance and have no other character. It is a question of creating peace and order in the interest of peaceable populations.

"We do not intend to establish ourselves, for example, in Esthonia or Livonia. In Courland and Lithuania our chief object is to create organs of self-determination and self-administration. Our military action, however, has produced a success far exceeding the original aim.

"To safeguard the fruits of our peace with the Ukraine, our army command drew the sword. Peace with Russia will be the happy result."

A RUSSIAN proclamation, issued February 26, calling on the people to defend the capital, says: "Germany has formally refused to grant an armistice, and German detachments continue to advance. Resistance thus becomes the principal task of revolution. Russia's strength lies in her wide territories, and the government can, and if need be will, retreat. If the threat against Petrograd increases, the government will remove to Moscow or another city.

"In spite of the fact that the government has accepted the peace conditions imposed by the German and Austrian governments, the Imperialist assassins are, nevertheless, continuing their monstrous advance into the interior of Russia.

"The cursed minions of William and the German Kaledine, together with the White Guards, are advancing against and shooting the Soviets, reconstituting the power of the landlords, bankers and capitalists and preparing for the restoration of the monarchy.

"The revolution is in peril. A mortal blow will be struck against Red Petrograd. If you workers, soldiers and peasants wish to retain power and the power of the Soviets, you must fight these hordes, who are now seeking to devour you to your last gasp.

"The decisive hour has struck. Workers and all oppressed men and women, you must swell the ranks of the Red battalions. To arms, all of you, that the struggle may only cease with your last breath!"

Austrian Foreign Minister Czernin sent this wireless message to Foreign Minister Trotzky in reply to the latter's query as to whether Austria would conclude a peace with Russia: "Austria, in concert with her allies, is ready to conclude negotiations of peace with Russia."

A SPECIAL cable to the New York Times dated at Petrograd on February 25 stated that the Russian troops almost without exception had flatly refused to fight; that the peasant soldiers, interested merely in getting land, caring nothing for the revolution, had started eastward in an almost uncontrollable tidal wave; that the Russian army was Germany's strongest weapon and that in driving it toward Petrograd they were driving a stampeding herd of cattle that would trample anything in the way. The correspondent declared that while the revolutionary workmen would put up a guerilla fight against the Germans, they could do nothing against the Russian army, which must disappear before the revolution could begin to create a real military force. He declared that the workmen of the towns were eager to fight. In a proclamation issued by the Bolsheviks February 27 resistance to the German invaders was declared the principal task of the revolution. Russia's greatest strength was ascribed to her wide territories, and the government announced that should the threat to Petrograd increase they would remove to Moscow. Then it said that, "if Germany's plundering raid should advance the task of the government would be to destroy the possibility of a simultaneous catastrophic decision by the Germans. They are attempting to crush the authority of the councils."

While the Bolsheviks seemed unable to muster sufficient forces to do more than hold the German advance, the fighting in the Don Cossack country was reported as resulting in their favor, Rostov-on-the-Don having been captured on February 25 and the capital, Novo Tcherkassk, on February 27. Continuous fighting was also in progress between Rumania and Bolsheviks in Bessarabia. At the request of the population Sweden landed forces on the Aland Islands off the coast of Finland, but at this writing Sweden had not acted upon the request of Finland for military assistance on the mainland. The German advance seemed to have somewhat slowed down at the points nearest to Petrograd, attempts to take Vitbesk having been foiled and a railway bridge destroyed. Further south near Dubno the invaders captured a division staff and 200 men, while north of Dorpat two regiments were taken.

Reports to Petrograd on February 27 indicated that there had been a considerable stiffening of Russian resistance to the German advance. German detachments which moved out of Luga were met by Russian troops which drove them back and which also occupied three small stations within twelve miles of Pskov, in the neighborhood of which city large Russian detachments were concentrating. Germans pushing forward further south, from Orsha, were also forced to retire, while German attempts to cross the Beresina River were foiled. Revel, the Russian naval base which was taken by the German army was fired on from Norgen Island, off the port, which had remained in Russian hands.

A request, received in Petrograd, on March 2, from the Russian delegates in the reconvened peace conference at Brest-Litovsk, that a special train with a sufficient escort be sent to meet them near Pskov, was taken by the Bolsheviks to indicate that the conference had been broken off. It had been reported earlier that the German delegates had notified the Russians that a treaty must be signed in three days.

Meantime the Germans had continued to press their advance, concentrating a division at Pskov, moving slowly toward Luga and driving forward some thirty-five miles beyond Polotzk, midway between Dvinsk and Vitebsk. The Russians had destroyed the railways and stores and the Germans advanced here through a barren land.

Further south German forces cooperating with the Ukrainians reached the River Dnieper, taking a strongly fortified bridgehead by storm. Austrian troops also entered the Ukraine in response to appeals for help from the Ukraine government.

Meantime Petrograd was preparing for a siege. Appeals were sent to the provinces for food, and soldiers who had gone home were asked to give their arms to the workmen who were rapidly being organized into a defense force.

The embassies of all the Entente nations were, on February 28, established at Vologda, 300 miles southeast of Petrograd. The Bolshevik government had returned to the capital, but the evacuation of civilians not necessary to defense was continuing.

I AM to speak to you this morning on a great theme. I am to tell you of the men who remember destiny. The scope of my theme reaches back into the dim beginnings of things in the past, and leaps out beyond the narrow confines of tomorrow.

To remember destiny is to remember God. To forget either is to play the part of a fool. Let us then, this morning, forget the roll of the ship we're in, and turn our attention to this worthy challenge.

Though it be important to remember destiny, the fact remains that the choice sons of far vision are appallingly few. The world is too busy to turn its thoughts to the things beyond its greedy touch. Cold, dead material pursuits hold a strangle grip on the masses of men. The daily routine of life's seemingly weary grind has killed many a man's loftiest aspirations. Indeed I would wager this morning that there are many on this old man-o'-war who have "lost out" in their reach for the noblest and best things, simply because they have let the routine grind be their master. There are those on board who have forgotten their God and are therefore not prepared to meet their Maker.

But the world outside our ship is no different. There are thousands who go year after year with little or no thoughts of God. They live and plan and work without him. Only a few dream out beyond their own little world and catch the flashes of destiny. And the destiny of which I speak is not the grave, but rather God's big, unending world beyond the grave. God made us for more than the present life we live. In that world beyond we can alone find out the full purpose of our creation. Only a few see this in all ages; but they, few though they be, are the sparkling gems in the stream of humanity.

THE men of far vision are the men who do things. To remember destiny is to be worth while. The man who forgets the purpose of his life is little more than driftwood, but the man who feels the spell of things to come will be the master of his fate. The men who remember the golden goal of all our life are the ones who bring things to pass. They reach out beyond the present world of things and feel after truth, until they are strangely conscious of a burning conviction, much akin to the passion of the Christ who said, "I must be about my Father's business." They, too, feel that they must be about something—they are no longer the same. Eternity has echoed in the depths of their souls; they never will be still. Forever now there surges within them the restless tide of destiny. They speak with a certain air of authority; and why shouldn't they? They have heard, they have seen, they have felt, and therefore they command. They are no visionary dreamers, they are the positive forces that shake the world. The world of things over which others stumble, they master as mere stepping-stones to higher things. They champion the cause of the sons of men, and care for the needs of their souls. They stand forever a warning to the world not to forget its Maker.

THESE men, with lofty souls and far-sighted vision, are the men who pay the price. They live a great life, they bring things to pass; but the cost of such living is staggering. I am not speaking this morning of an easy way covered with roses; it is the path of sacrifice and thorns of which I speak. It is stained with the blood of great prophets and made sacred by the noblest souls that have lived. But the choice sons of far vision face the costs and pay them. Nothing can stop them in their fearless drive for the golden sceptre of their destiny. Fire, storm, wind, and wave they master. They ride into the teeth of death with drawn sword, and defy all the demons of the underworld. They meet the hounds of hell with the lashing whip of confidence, till the fiendish growls fade into the quivering whimpers of frightened cattle. To remember destiny, to live for destiny, is but to be not afraid to die.

The men who constantly remember, live and plan and work in view of their ultimate destiny, are the men who leave pathways for the world to remember. They are the fore-gleams of that hidden world that makes this world worth living. Erase the mighty-souled prophets of Israel, blot out the philosophers of Greece, forget the Christian statesmen of both continents, and tell me what kind of a world we would have! These men seem the marks of God in the sands of time.

And indeed it is true that God reveals himself to the world only through personality—these men are his revelation and in them we can read the voice of God. They seem the gleaming hope that never will be still.

IT is for this reason that humanity turns to the life of the Christian's Christ. In him alone gleams in all its fullness that hope which the human soul so deeply craves. He is the way, the truth and the life.

We are met this morning, my fellow shipmates, in this forward compartment of the berth deck for our church service. Here I have gone over, in a broken talk, one of life's burning truths. You have been sitting there listening to me, and I am wondering what your thoughts are. I would that every man aboard this good ship had settled his relation to Christ in the proper way. We are all traveling the same journey to a destiny. What it shall be is determined by what we say it shall be. All that's good in life whispers to you. The church back at home has no doubt again and again thrown down to you the Christian challenge. Christianity offers you all you can ask or think, and God pity you and your poor soul if you turn your back on its priceless offer. You can this morning definitely tie up with the Christian program. You can settle, once and for all, your destiny. Yes, you yourself, on board this old ship of steel, can become one of those choice sons of far vision. You can walk that pathway made sacred by the blood of noble spirits. You can feel the surging tides of another world within you and have God's eternity echo in the deep recesses of your soul. Will you refuse the heaven that's offered you and be without God when he can be had for the asking?

The Shuttle in the Loom of Trade

American Locomotives Built by Thousands to Speed the World's Traffic

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

The Centipede, built to take hold. It will pull a freight train five miles long

WHEN war was declared we had about 65,000 locomotives. The number was greater than that of the railway system of any other nation or people, but it soon fell short of the transportation demands.

We have tens of millions of capital invested in locomotive works, and there are between thirty and forty companies which are making steam and electric engines of one kind or another for railway use. They are all working at their fullest capacity and the principal ones are turning out engines at a speed which no one deemed possible a few years ago. During 1917 the number of locomotives ordered from our shops by this country and our allies in Europe was more than 7,600, and of these more than 2,000 were ordered by the United States government for service on American railways in France. Over 2,800 were contracted for to be exported to England, France and Russia, and something like 2,700 for the United States and Canada. In the first order given by the government a locomotive was turned out within twenty working days after the order was placed, and the American Locomotive Company, the Baldwin Locomotive Company and others have been pushing their work as never before.

THE Baldwin Locomotive Company here at Philadelphia is the largest single locomotive plant in the United States, its output running side by side with that of the American Locomotive Company, which is a combination of a number of locomotive concerns formed in 1901. The Baldwin company, at certain times during the past few months, has turned out seventeen railway locomotives per day, and it is now producing at the rate of 2,500 or 3,000 locomotives per year. It has made eighty-eight in one week.

And such locomotives! They are of all sizes and for war work of every description. They range from the little donkey engine used in the logging camp to get out the wood for the shipyards to the great 2-10-2, or Centipede type, which aids in rushing the vast loads of food and other materials to the seaboard. The Centipede is the heaviest engine ever built. It weighs 853,000 pounds, and it can move a solid train of freight cars almost five miles in length. These engines include also the small double-headers that are now being made for work behind the lines in France, and the fast passenger locomotives which are carrying our troops at sixty miles per hour to the transports which will take them across the Atlantic. They include engines for the coal mines and those which are carrying fuel all over the country. They include the locomotives which burn fuel oil, and the electric engines, which many believe will be the railway locomotives of the future. They include, in short, engines of every description for use not only by ourselves and our allies, but for almost every country all over the world.

IN order to show you what we are doing in building locomotives, I have spent a day in the Baldwin shops, going through the plants where 20,000 men are employed, and talking with the officials in charge. The shops in Philadelphia, covering eighteen acres, have always been considered remarkable. When the plant was started, away back in the times when Andrew Jackson was President, it was a mile and a half from town and was surrounded by forests. Now the great city has grown up to and swallowed it, and there are three big high schools within a stone's throw of where they are making parts of steam engines.

The business has long since outgrown Philadelphia. The Eddystone plant, twelve miles up the Delaware, which was first used for the overflow, is now the main factory, and it will probably take in the Philadelphia plant at some time in the near future. It lies in the arms of three railroads, and Atlantic steamers can come to its wharves and load locomotives for Europe. The plant altogether covers 400 acres and there are single shops whose ground floor is twice as great as that of the Capitol building in Washington.

THE beginning of the locomotive is in a little valley in the Alleghany Mountains at the Burnham steel plant. This has a capital of $16,000,000, and it pays out in wages $100,000 a week, but it is a part of the Baldwin locomotive works. The furnaces and mills cover 160 acres, and it has a single machine shop which is three-fourths of a mile long. The castings are taken from Burnham to Eddystone, where they are forged and often reshaped for the engine.

There are hundreds—I might almost say thousands of parts in a single locomotive, and each part has to be made from drawings and cast and forged and smoothed to the right shape. After that it is brought to the erecting shop and there assembled into the engine.

This seems an easy process until you realize the enormous size of a locomotive, and the way in which the many parts have to be handled and welded and fitted to shape. The size of the larger locomotives is enormous, and single parts weigh many tons. It takes the most powerful machinery to handle them, including overhead cranes so powerful that one will lift up a whole locomotive as though it were a bag of feathers and move it back and forth through the shop or in and out to the tracks on each side.

THE immensity of everything is astounding. The fire box of a big locomotive is so large that the ordinary narrow-gauge engine of the old style could be put inside it. The low pressure cylinders are so big that a man can sit upright within them, and the heating surface of the tubes and flues measures more than 6,000 square feet. The material has to be made so it will withstand the heaviest weights. That on the driving wheels, for instance, is 475,000 pounds, and that on the truck wheels is 30,000 pounds. The largest engines now have twelve wheels on each side, with guiding wheels at the front.

So much coal is used in these big locomotives that the fuel cannot be shoveled in by the fireman. It is dumped by machinery automatically into the fire box. The fireman pulls only a lever and the coal is carried in from the tender and spread evenly over the grate.

In the center of the erecting shop, high up under the roof, reached by stairs, were the offices of the shop, with a platform about them. I climbed up and looked down upon the mighty stable in which they were grooming and polishing these huge iron horses. In some places the engines were moving out at the back, entirely complete and ready for work. In others they were in parts, resting on trucks. Here they were lifted by overhead cranes and carried high through the air to the track outside the shop to make room for other engines within.

THERE the men were busy working on fire boxes, screwing together the steel walls of which they were made and riveting the ends of the screws by pneumatic machines. Here they were putting the scores of tubes into the boilers, and farther over they were covering the great cylinder which holds the hot water with sheets of asbestos half as thick as your fist.

But the story of the locomotive is one of infinite

The German Chancellor Proclaims Agreement

SPEAKING before the Reichstag on February 25, the Imperial German Chancellor, Count von Hertling, declared: "I can fundamentally agree with the four principles which, in President Wilson's view, must be applied in a mutual exchange of views, and thus declare with President Wilson that a general peace can be discussed on such a basis."

He stated that one reserve must be made, and that was that the principles must also be recognized by all states and peoples. Referring to President Wilson's declaration that in his previous speech he, the Chancellor, had been talking to the court of the entire world, Count von Hertling declared that he must "decline this court as prejudiced." Taking up President Wilson's four basic principles one at a time, Chancellor von Hertling declared, in relation to the first one, that each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of the particular case, and upon such adjustments as are most likely to bring the peace that will be permanent. "Who would contradict this?" He also readily gave unconditional assent to the second clause, which declared that peoples and provinces should not be bartered as pawns in the discredited game of the balance of power. He felt that the third clause, which declared that territorial settlement must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations, was included in the assent to the second clause, and he assented in principle to the President's fourth requirement, that all well-defined national aspirations should be accorded the utmost satisfaction possible, without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord.

If he had stopped there his speech might have represented a considerable step toward the ultimate convening of the peace conference, but he qualified the declaration, that Germany did not contemplate the retention of Belgium, by declaring that "we must be safeguarded from the danger of a country with which we desire after the war to live in peace and friendship becoming the object or the jumping-off ground of enemy machinations." He also declared: "Our warfare, even where it must be offensive in action, is defensive in aim." He gave considerable time to an explanation and defense of Germany's new advance in Russia. (This part of his speech was noted on page 303). The history of the peace negotiations at Brest-Litovsk, coupled with Germany's defensive invasion of a practically defenseless country, were held in most of the Allied capitals to nullify and contradict the Chancellor's assertion that Germany was ready to make peace on a basis of international justice.

Speaking in the House of Commons on February 27, Foreign Secretary Balfour of the British Cabinet told the members that he was unable to find in Von Hertling's speech any basis for a fruitful conversation or a hope for peace. Mr. Balfour said also that the final fate of the Russian provinces and of Rumania and of Armenia must ultimately be decided by the peace conference.

Common opinion in London was reported to be that there could be no peace with militarism flushed with conquest, and this opinion "had been strengthened by the spectacle of the Chancellor cooing like a dove while the Prussian eagle was fastening its claws in its victim."

It was expected that Count Czernin would also reply, and consultations between Secretary Lansing, Colonel House and the President were taken to indicate that the President would soon again address these Teutonic spokesmen.

A Week in the World's News

BROWNING GUN A SUCCESS. About 300 witnesses, including French, British, Italian, Belgian and American officers, senators, representatives, and some 50 reporters, witnessed the official tests of the Browning automatic machine gun on Feb. 27, at the government rifle range at Congress Heights near Washington. The light rifle is air-cooled and weighs about 15 pounds, the heavy gun is water-cooled and weighs about 34½ pounds. Both guns use the same ammunition as the Springfield rifle and the modified Enfield rifle. The light gun shoots 20 shots in 2½ seconds and can be reloaded for another 20 would reach several thousand a week before June. The deliveries of the heavy gun were also to begin soon.

RUSSIA YIELDS TO TEUTONS. On March 3d Berlin reported, "By reason of the signing of the Peace treaty with Russia, military movements in Great Russia have ceased." Petrograd confirmed this, reporting that in addition to the previous demands for alienation of former Russian territory the new ul-all of Armenia again under the Turkish yoke. New massacres were reported at Samsun, a village of 13,000, near Tribizond, the entire male Armenian population being killed.

HOOVER SAYS EAT MEAT. Because of the loyal adherence of the people to the program of food conservation, and the resulting increase in available stocks, and also to make it easier to secure grain needed for export, Food Administrator Hoover, on March 3, relaxed materially the regulations regarding the eating of meat products. He now makes Tuesday, instead of meatless, merely beefless and porkless. The new schedule is Monday and Wednesday wheatless, Tuesday beefless and porkless, one meal each day wheatless.

ROOTING FOR GRAFT. Five members of the Senate Committee on Commerce reached the Hog Island Shipyard on Feb. 25 to make the inspection ordered by the Senate. The committee went all over the yard and at the close of the inspection Senator Ransdell of Louisiana and Senator Harding of Ohio were convinced that much of the criticism regarding the expenditure in this construction was unjustified. Sen. Ransdell said, "There is nothing like this yard in the world, and the main idea seems to have been to build ships rapidly. This extreme desire may have led to a number of mistakes, but I see no reason why the government won't have a valuable asset in Hog Island."

HOUSE PASSES RAILROAD BILL. By a vote of 337 to 6 the House of Representatives on Feb. 28 passed the Administration Railroad Bill amending it only to the extent of providing for government operation of short line railroads. In this the House agreed with the bill recently passed by the Senate. The Senate bill provided that government operation should cease 18 months after the conclusion of a treaty of peace, while the House bill, as passed, set the time at 2 years. The two bills also differed in that the Senate provided that the President's power to make rates should be subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission, while the House bill made the President's power absolute. The bill went at once to conference.

UNIONS WOULD BUILD SHIPS. Representatives of union labor submitted to President Wilson on February 28 plans under which they claimed it would be possible to turn out 5,000,000 tons of wooden shipping during the coming year.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The naval tug Cherokee foundered on Feb. 27 in a gale off the Maryland coast. Ten survivors and the bodies of eight others of the crew of 39 were landed by rescue boats. . . . The bill authorizing the expenditure of $50,000,000 for housing facilities for shipyards went to the President for his signature on Feb. 26. . . . Col. Roosevelt was reported on Feb. 28 to be convalescing rapidly from the serious operation which took him to the Roosevelt Hospital in New York early in the month, but it was said that his left ear would be deaf. . . . Director Gen. McAdoo, in orders issued on Feb. 27, placed all responsibility for the operating of the railroads in the hands of the regional directors, retaining the direction of car service in his own office. He instructed that locomotives and shop labor were to be transferred from one road to another according to the needs of the general service, and that there must be no interruption of work by questions arising between employers and employees. . . . shots in another 2½ seconds. The water-cooled gun shoots 250 rounds without reloading. The air-cooled gun can fire about 350 continuous shots before it is necessary to stop to cool the weapon. The water-cooled gun has fired as many as 400,000 shots without overheating. The light gun can be fired from the shoulder when it is sighted like the ordinary rifle, and it can be fired from the hip during an advance. Both models functioned perfectly in the tests and it was announced that three factories were now turning out the light gun and that production

This territory was wrested from Turkey by Russia in four wars, 1828-29, 1854-1855, 1877-78 and the present war, although Russia had already agreed to restore the major portions of her most recent conquests. This demand upon Russia, which she felt herself powerless to refuse, was made on the pretext of the right of peoples to self-determination; it results in throwing practically

Is the Food Administration Worth While?

WHY is Hoover and what is he doing? is recognized by the Food Administration as a proper question. Next week Dr. Howard B. Grose, in an article written specially for the Christian Herald, answers both these questions and some others and tells how the members of the Christian Herald Family may do their part in the Conservation and Production of Food.

Maynard Owen Williams is busy now in relief work in Russian Armenia. Next week, writing from Tiflis, he takes us down the valley of the Volga and to the Great Fair at Nizhni.

Next week also Dr. Gray will tell us what the prophets have foretold regarding Christ's Future Earthly Reign.

Howard Chase finds in next week's installment that his Gospel has begun to work out in the hearts of some people in Red Hill. This story will end in the Easter issue, March 27. Waiting impatiently to follow it is a new serial, "The Measure of a Man," by Mr. Grace Livingston Hill Lutz. You will find it a good measure, you will admire the man, and you will love the woman, who is of course no small part of the story.

The Way Out

ONE of the clearest thinkers among our American churchmen today is Dr. Robert E. Speer, chairman of the General War-Time Commission of Churches. In a recent public address he reviewed the favorable and unfavorable elements in the present situation as they affect the interests of the Church in America. Two things he regards as genuine signs, viz., the increasing interest of our soldiers in religion and the growing cooperation between the denominations. We believe intelligent public opinion will stand behind Dr. Speer. He does not fail, however, to note the difficulties in the way of spiritual work. Among these he indicates "the sterilization of men's minds under military discipline," the cost and hindrances of Church division, the existing moral torpor among our people as a whole, and the consequent danger to religion and the Church.

There is little doubt that our soldiers have more religious opportunities than they had been accustomed to in civil life. Dr. J. Ross Stevenson emphasized this point, and added that there was no room in the camps for a sectarian divisive spirit; while Dr. Frank Mason North scored a distinct point when he asserted that the time had come for each denomination within the Church to consider about its own hearthstone how far the things it had deemed its own peculiar possession were really essential, and whether, in the new spirit of the times, the barriers that separate the denominations from each other might not be burned away. Such statements a year ago would have been regarded by many as radical; now they are accepted as entirely logical.

It may well be asked by thoughtful churchmen, and especially by denominational leaders, how the multitudes of our soldiers when they come back to civil life will regard denominations. Dr. William Adams Brown has indicated the way out of this difficulty: "The Church, first of all, must test herself by the basic principles for which she stands, and the need of their application to the social and international world. Clearly," he urges, "if we are to meet the issues of the new world, we must meet them together. A united world requires a united Church. If we ask God for victory for the cause to which we are committed, let us ask him, first of all, that this cause be triumphant within ourselves. Confessing with shame the sins of our past, our narrow vision, our unhappy divisions, let us pray him to make us one in his spirit, an instrument which he can use for the world's redemption."

We would ask our denominational friends to think over these views expressed by Church leaders, in considering the great problems created by the war. These problems must be dealt with, and the sooner the Church applies itself to this duty resolutely, self-sacrificingly, and in the spirit of the great Founder, the sooner it will find the way out of its troubles.

Methodist Unification Progressing

THE joint commission on Methodist unification did not reach an impasse, as many feared it might, at its recent meeting in Savannah. On the contrary, it reached a tentative agreement which seems likely to be definitely accepted at its final meeting in St. Louis, April 10. In its two weeks' session it gave to the chief difficulty an unlimited discussion as to the place in the proposed union which the Negro members should take, and good temper prevailed throughout. The Southern Commissioners would have preferred that the 340,000 colored members of the Methodist Episcopal Church should be organized, with others of the same race, into a separate and independent body, as the Southern General Conference proposed four years ago. The Northern Commissioners, with some exceptions, were unwilling to eliminate their colored brethren, and felt that the organic relations between the two races should not be broken. The desire for unification being very strong on both sides, all labored hard to find a solution mutually acceptable. This solution finally took the form indicated in paragraph 4, in the following outline of the plan of unification:

1. A General Conference in which all elements should have representation, and which should have supreme legislative power and administration in that which concerns the Church as a whole;
2. A Judicial Council to decide appeals and constitutional questions—a new feature in Methodism;
3. Six or more Regional Conferences in the United States, each having legislative power over the affairs of its own jurisdiction and the selection of bishops, under certain restrictions;
4. Five or more Central Conferences, grouped on geographical and racial lines, embracing annual conferences in the foreign mission fields and among the colored people in this country. These Central Conferences to have limited representation in the General Conference, and to select their own bishops when they have 150,000 members. They may also become Associate General Conferences when they have 600,000 members, with practical autonomy and modified representation in the national bodies.

This plan would group the white annual conferences of the two Churches in the United States into six Regional Conferences, meeting once in four years; and the colored conferences in this country and the conferences in Europe, Eastern Asia, Southern Asia, and Latin America into five Central Conferences, with ten delegates each in the General Conference. The fear of the Southern brethren that the Northern Commissioners were aiming at social equality for the Negro was set at rest, and they accepted the proposition numbered 4 "as a basis for determining the status of the Negro within the reorganized Church," with only three dissenting votes, two episcopal and one lay.

In the interval before the final meeting at St. Louis on April 10, the sentiment, of the South particularly, will be tested. It seems highly probable that the plan will be accepted and reported to the Southern General Conference which meets in Atlanta in May. If so, and that body ratifies it, the Northern General Conference will be convened to finish the work. If the Southern Church does not take favorable action, unification will be delayed, not defeated.

The Consumers Protected

THOUGH retail prices of all commodities are high, they are not as high relatively as wholesale prices. Retail merchants are being held strictly to account and there is little unjust profiteering.

Figures given out by the Department of Labor show that during 1916 phenomenal advances were recorded in the wholesale prices of many commodities belonging to the groups designated as farm products, food, cloths and clothing, fuel and lighting, and metals and metal products. In December as compared with January, there was an increase of 30 per cent. in average wholesale prices of farm products, which include many food articles in the raw state, 28 per cent. in wholesale prices of food, 40 per cent. in cloths and clothing, 60 per cent. in fuel and lighting, and 47 per cent. in metals and metal products.

During 1917 pronounced increases took place during the first 8 months, the advance from March to May being particularly noticeable among farm products and articles used for food. From June to August there were declines in the food and the fuel and lighting groups, and in the aggregate September prices were below those of the preceding three months. From October to November most commodities increased sharply in price. Average wholesale prices for the year 1917 were 75 per cent. higher than those for 1913, the year before the war began.

Notwithstanding these inevitable increases, the consumers have been well protected by the Federal Administrations against undue extortion. The retail prices of most of these commodities have fluctuated at a relatively lower level, as compared with prices in 1913, than have wholesale prices. This is particularly true of bacon, lard, butter, milk, eggs, flour, corn meal, and potatoes. Comparing prices in December, 1917, with the average in 1913, it is seen that only two articles of twenty-eight important food commodities show a larger per cent. of increase in the retail than in the wholesale prices. These are dressed poultry and granulated sugar in New York. In most of the other months of 1917 the retail prices of these articles were relatively lower than were their wholesale prices.

"He That Hath Understanding"

IF this were an age which believed in omens, there might be considerable significance attached to the fall of Jerusalem. One of the many writers who are still discussing that event calls attention to the fact that the Holy City has always fallen in the direction in which history, both political and religious, has been moving. "From the days of David it has been conquered by the great conquerors. Today it is in Christian hands. The omen is, indeed, auspicious. We shall have many pronouncements as to the end of the world, now that Jerusalem has fallen. Pessimism is not a sign of faith. Jerusalem in its falls has had historical rather than miraculous meaning."

This, from the Biblical World of Chicago, is meant as a reproof of those who regard the liberation of David's ancient capital from infidel rule as having any significance beyond what attaches to a mere incident of the war. It seems to have escaped the attention of the faculty who edit the periodical in question that the redemption of Jerusalem is capable of a very positive interpretation in the light of prophecy, and that the Christian Church has become fully awake on this point. Some of the most distinguished Biblical scholars, here and in Europe, are agreed that the event marks the end of "the times of the Gentiles." They point to the historical record of the city's capture by Omar in 637 A. D., then to the passage in Daniel 7:25, and finally to the discovery that the 1335 year reckoning, according to Turkish chronology—fell on 1917, which year was to be blessed to the Jewish race, because it would witness the deliverance of their ancient seat from the oppressor.

Prophecy, which runs like a vein of silver through the Scriptures, part disclosed, part hidden, has been too long put aside as though it were a sealed book, unprofitable to investigate. May we not look forward to the time when the study of prophecy both in the Old and New Testaments will be an important feature in all ministerial preparation?

The Soul's Anchor

EARTH would be joyless without the soul brightness of hope. Hope is the angel cheering us when burdened, tried, persecuted and helpless. Hope sustains the soldier on the battlefield, the sailor on the ocean, the prisoner in the cell. Hope in the promises of men is often groundless and blasted, but hope in God, in His Word and in His Son Jesus Christ, rests upon the enduring Rock of Ages. If our Lord were still reposing in a Syrian tomb, our hope would be vain; but He is risen, He is the Resurrection and the Life; because Christ lives, we shall live also. He is the living Christ, and ours is the living hope. There are many dead hopes in the world, but there is One that is alive forever more.

Hope in God and you will praise Him with a joyful heart. The object of hope is victory over sin, death, hell and the grave, and the possession of the heavenly inheritance. A worldly life cannot inspire such hope. The righteous only have hope in His death. Hope cannot be bought with wealth, influence or power. It is a free gift unto all men who will have Christ in them, the hope of glory.

The values of this soul condition of hopefulness are unaffected by vicissitudes, seasons or times. It is an anchor to the soul, grasping the everlasting foundations of eternity. It is the powerful engine of life, drawing the train of treasures toward the city of God. He gives His children the blessed hope, which beholds with unspeakable expectation the distant glory reserved in heaven for you. While journeying onward, we are kept by the power of God until we reach the eternal home. A banker once said to his faithful clerk, "I have given you ten thousand dollars in my will. I have also decided to pay you the interest, six hundred dollars, during each year of my life. That will help keep you until you enter upon the inheritance." Christ has made us heirs of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeeth not away, reserved for us, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. His keeping power is as essential as the glorious possession.

Tokens of Spring

SPRING has come again. We know! For this morning as we walked past a flower-shop we glanced in at the window of it and saw a great bowl of golden jonquils and tulips massed together. And the yellow glow of them swept out across the dull March weather in a smilingly triumphant way.

Flowers of springtime! One always thinks of them together. One always thinks of a meadow dotted with the blue of violets, of arbutus hiding in the deep wood, of narcissus on the river bank, of faintly pink blossoms in the orchard. Springtime and flowers mean nearly the same thing. Far across the sea the meadows of many lands are torn into trenches and the damp woods are plowed and broken by shot and shell. Over the sea, orchards and fields are no longer spots of beauty. Where scarlet poppies blew there are redder flowers growing, and where purple flags sprang toward the sun, there are new graves. And when the war is only a memory, there will again be blossoms in the renewed orchards, and spring flowers will again grow shyly in the peaceful depths of the woods. The poppies will be lovelier than ever before among the untrampled wheat, and the purple flags will be more regal, because they spring from the sleeping-place of heroes.

It is spring again. The yellow tulips and jonquils told us so this morning, and they told us more—much more. For they told us that, no matter how heart-weary the world may be, no matter how wars may rage, there will always be a returning springtime, with its blessing and its flowers.

Three Great Churches Unite

ALTHOUGH the consolidation of three great churches in New York had been talked of for some time, the announcement from their pulpits on Sunday, February 17, that a joint committee had unanimously recommended such action, came as a great surprise. These three, among the most famous Presbyterian churches in the United States, are the Old First Church, at Fifth Avenue and Twelfth Street; the University Place Church, at University Place and Tenth Street, and the Madison Square Church, at Madison Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street. It will be necessary for the congregations of the three churches to adopt the plan of consolidation. The First Church congregation voted unanimously in favor of it, but the other two churches postponed the consideration of the matter. Should the congregations adopt the plan of union the action of the New York Presbytery will be necessary to ratify it. The three pastors are men of preeminent ability and widespread reputation. They are all old men with long pastorates, knowing no dead line. Dr. Parkhurst is seventy-five, and has been pastor at Madison Square thirty-eight years. Dr. Alexander is seventy-four and has held his pastorate thirty-four years; Dr. Duffield is sixty-three and has been pastor of the First Church twenty-six years. These ministers have all scuffled with the discouraging problem of the "downtown church" and have come to as wise a solution of it as possible. Each church had a large endowment fund, a necessary anchorage in a business, foreign or needy population, so the merger will have $1,200,000 of an endowment to begin with. The three church properties are worth $2,000,000 more, making a working capital of $3,200,000. These pastors and the body of laymen who have stood by them have felt the evangelistic call, and instituted missions to the poor and neglected populations, including the Emmanuel Chapel, the Bethlehem Chapel and the Italian Mission owned and operated so successfully by the University Place Church, and the Madison Square Church House. It is understood that the merger contemplates the pensioning of these old honored pastors. It is to be hoped that this union will be effected and will result in what its promoters desire: the carrying of the Gospel and a Christlike benevolence to the poor and neglected, in obedience to the command: "Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled." (Luke 14 : 23.)

Idlers Drafted for Work

GOVERNOR EDGE signed a bill recently passed by the New Jersey Legislature providing that all loafers, tramps, and other idlers of the male sex in the boundaries of the state should be conscripted for some useful employment during the war. The law requires able-bodied males between the ages of eighteen and fifty to be regularly engaged in some useful, lawful business, profession, occupation, or employment necessary for the protection and welfare of the state and the United States. A method of procedure is provided which imposes penalties for non-compliance. The act does not include workmen out on a strike, nor the use of the men drafted to work as strike-breakers. The working people who believe in work were generally friendly to the bill. This is an excellent law, that could be wisely copied by other states. In war or peace, industry is the basis of all physical, mental and moral progress. Hence the Almighty made it a law as a part of one of the Ten Commandments. "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work." (Ex. 20 : 9.)

Notorious Loan Shark Dead.

A MAN widely known as a "loan shark," who had offices in sixty-three American and Canadian cities, where he carried on the business of lending money to the common people at an extortionate rate of interest, died the other day. He lent money to those drawing salaries and to humble wage-earners at an enormously high rate of interest. And in a large number of instances he would sue on the notes and foreclose on the security, afflicting the borrower and his family after taking everything they had in the world. To protect himself against annoyance, indignant rebuke and possibly rough physical treatment, he employed women to take charge of his offices, who with bland voice and manner told the debtors they were only employees and had no option in the matter, but were compelled to obey orders, and then proceeded to rob the poor victims without mercy. But the thousands that the

Blackfoot Indian Chief Dead

THREE BEARS, famous old chief of the Blackfoot Indians, died February 10 in his home lodge on the Glacier National Park Reservation, Montana. He was a little more than 100 years old, as near as the oldest living Blackfoot braves can reckon. The only way they figure his age is that in his conversation concerning boyhood days he used to relate that John Quincy Adams was the first great pale-face chief of the nation he recollected hearing the Indians talk about. Adams was inaugurated President of the United States in 1825. Three Bears had often said that at that time he was using the bow and arrow with arms strong enough to kill black bear on the mountainside. With the passing of Three Bears one can count on the fingers of two hands the Indians now alive who lived in the real bow-and-arrow days. Three Bears was famed as a warrior as a result of the many encounters during the early 60's into which he led the Blackfoot braves against the belligerent Sioux tribes. The old Indian chief was buried with the highest rites of his race. The hand of this Indian touched the primitive age of the bow and arrow, but the white man sold his people firearms and fire-water with which to kill the neighboring tribes and destroy themselves. When Three Bears was born the Blackfoot Indians numbered nearly 500,000. When he died there were but 5,000 of them left. This old Indian's face brings a feeling of sadness and shame to many American hearts at the cruel and unjust treatment of his noble race by the white man. A great opportunity for evangelism was afforded our forefathers; but instead of using truth, righteousness and love to save the red man, they used the rifle and whisky bottle to annihilate him, and would have done so if the national conscience had not asserted itself and restored to him a fragment of the lands stolen from him, shut off intoxicants from him, taught him farming and other useful arts, instructed his children in the schools, and brought the Gospel of Jesus Christ to them. The result is that many of the Indians are industrious, educated, thrifty, useful, upright and happy. The result is that the noble red men are not to be extinct in this country, but are increasing each year in numbers. In 1890 they numbered 243,000; in 1900, 270,000; and in 1910, 305,000, not including those in Alaska. In the nation's present treatment of the red man there is illustrated this truth expressed by an inspired singer of Israel: "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." (Ps. 85 : 10.)

shark had wronged had some satisfaction in seeing him caught in the net of the law and punished by a fine of $1,000 and a term in the penitentiary. In sentencing him the Justice rebuked the prisoner in a blistering fashion. The man's attorney, family and friends went to the Governor of the state with 25,000 notes representing $500,000, and told him that they would make a bonfire and burn them all up if he would release the prisoner. But, the Governor feeling the sentence just, the offender concluded that, as the disgrace was on him already, he would serve out his term and keep his notes and securities. In the early history of the race the word "usury" meant interest on borrowed money, carrying no dishonor with it. But money-lenders then charged such outrageous rates of interest that the name came in more modern times to stand for extortionate rates of interest, and civilized society has made a legal rate of interest and calls the illegal rate usury. The Mosaic law left no room for loan sharks, as it did not allow a man who loaned money to a poor man to charge any interest at all. This is the text of the law on the subject: "If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury." (Ex. 22 : 25.)

Miners Demand American Flag

AUSTRIAN miners in Crawford County, Kansas, caused much apprehension a few days ago when they threatened to strike and tie up the coal mines. Investigation by Federal authorities revealed the fact that the miners refused to work unless an American flag was displayed in each mine. The mine operators, who were loyal men, quickly complied with the demands. The Austrians then returned, each man saluting the Stars and Stripes as he entered the mouth of the mine. This under the circumstances is a beautiful picture of loyalty to our government. It is because people from all nations, including those against which we are warring, are true to the flag that our nation is so strong and so united in the present contest. The incident illustrates also the fact that the man who digs the coal out of the earth to warm the homes, to turn the wheels of industry, to load the ships with food, clothing, fuel and munitions for the Allied armies is as necessary to win the war as the superb boys who have gone out to do the fighting. It is well for the Christian to show his colors in the moral battles of life, to have the banner of the Cross where people can see it, at the mouth of the mine, over the mill, store, shop, office, or home, as a symbol of Christ's infinite love. The relation of a flag to an army in time of war is thus referred to: "Terrible as an army with banners." (Song of Sol. 6 : 4.)

Wind Scatters Dollar Bills

AMERCHANT was entering a bank in Newark, N. J., the other day when a gust of wind lifted his hat from his head. Instinctively he threw up both hands to catch it. In doing so he let go 595 one-dollar bills which he held in one of his hands and the wind scattered them in every direction. He ran frantically after them trying to gather them up, and citizens near by aided him. A traffic policeman seeing the dilemma also rendered service in recovering the flying money. But when the depositor counted what were picked up he was 200 one-dollar bills short. The wind got a few but some of the "kind friends" took the most of them. How does the poor weak heart of man crave money, and how often do men take it from their neighbor! Perhaps nine out of ten of these men would have thrown a brick through a jeweler's window and taken the diamonds, or held up a man on a dark street and taken his purse, but for fear of detection. In this case the danger of detection was small and they became robbers. In the flight of the money and loss of the $200 there was illustrated this great truth: "Riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven." (Prov. 23 : 5.)

The Life of Faith and Prayer

TEXT—Isa. 55:11. "My word shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I send it."

THE keynote of this passage is found in the eighth and ninth verses: "For My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and My thoughts than your thoughts." God's thoughts and ways, both in nature and in grace, are transcendently higher than man's, and the principles of His government often seem to our short-sighted sense and reason like paradoxes and contradictions. Several of these principles are illustrated in this beautiful figure, drawn from the elements and operations of nature.

The beneficence of forces, which seem at first sight to be only baneful and alarming. The snow and the rain appear to be destructive forces. There is nothing more terrible than the cyclone sweeping over land and sea, wrecking the dismantled ship, flooding the swollen river, sweeping away the forest and the town, and leaving behind it a tract of desolated homes and lifeless human beings; unless it be the terror of the snow, the fierce blizzard, burying beneath its winding-sheet the shepherd and his flock and the shelterless traveler on the mountain waste, or hurled down from Alpine heights, as the overwhelming avalanche that buries in its ruins the mountain village or the surprised wayfarer. And yet these forces and elements are among the most useful and beneficent in the whole economy of nature. Take away the rain from India's plains, and the horrors of famine follow. Send the showers to the mighty wastes of Arizona, Utah, and Colorado, and lo, the wilderness and the solitary place shall rejoice and the desert shall blossom as the rose. What makes Palestine today a desolation? The failure of the rains. And what is beginning to restore some of their ancient verdure to the hills of Judah? The gradual return of the early and the latter rain. And even the snow, with its terrible avalanches and its blinding blizzards, is the storehouse of the river and the fountain.

And so in the economy of grace it is likewise true, that the things which seem most forbidding and disastrous often hide God's richest blessings. Even sin and sorrow, even disease and death are transformed by the alchemy of grace into occasions for man's highest good and God's most signal glory. Out of Adam's fall comes Christ's redemption and man's union with God. Out of death, with its humiliation and terror, comes the better resurrection. Out of human sorrow comes the discipline that sanctifies and revives the precious gold of holy character and heavenly grace. Even sickness becomes the occasion for the Master's healing touch and quickening power. Happy they who have learned to paint the rainbow on the rain-cloud, and find the fountains of life mid the snow-clad mountain heights!

THE apparent waste of natural forces and their conversion into other forms and forces of helpfulness and blessing. There is nothing that seems more prodigal than the waste of nature. The showers fall and sink into the ground, and seem to be lost. The rain cometh down from heaven and returneth not thither; the rivers run into the sea and become absorbed in the ocean's brine. All this seems like a waste of precious material, and yet science has taught us that no force is ever wasted, but simply converted into another form in which it goes on its way with an altered ministry, but an undiminished force.

Some one has represented in a sort of poetic parable a little raindrop trembling in the air, and questioning with the genius of the sky whether it should fall upon the earth or still linger in the beautiful cloud. At last the timid crystal drop, with one tear of regret, disappears beneath the soil, and is speedily drunk up by the parched ground. It has gone out of sight—apparently out of existence. But, lo, the root of yonder lily drinks in its moisture; the sap vessels of that damask rose absorb its refreshing draught; the far-reaching rootlet of yonder vine has found that fountain of life, and in a little while that raindrop comes forth in the snowy blossom of the lily, in the rich perfume of the rose, in the purple cluster of the vine, and, as it meets once more the genius of the air, it answers back its glad acknowledgment: "Yes, I died, but I have risen, and now I live in a higher ministry, in a larger life, in a better resurrection."

So it is with the Word of God and the life of faith. Wasted it sometimes seems. The message falls and the echo ceases, and the curtain drops and nothing is manifest. "I have labored in vain; I have spent my strength for naught," is, perhaps, the preacher's cry; but silently that Word of God is working out its mission; that soul is springing into life; that purpose is forming into action; that promise is ripening into faith, and it shall accomplish that which He has pleased. The preacher may pass out of sight, but in his place a score of lives will rise to carry on the work. The text and the sermon may be forgotten, but a transformed character will come forth. "I cannot tell," said the humble shepherd's wife, "what sermon it was that led to my conversion. I cannot even explain the creed and the catechism, but I know that something has changed me. Last summer John and I washed the sheep in yonder stream. I cannot tell you where the water went, but I can show you the clean, white fleeces of the sheep. And so I may forget the doctrine, but I have its blessed fruit in my heart and life."

THERE are many spiritual forces in God's great husbandry that man's records will never trace, but all the same they are doing their work and will mingle with the great mass in the harvest. Dr. Gordon tells of a poor old colored auntie who was a cripple in her wretched suburb, called Cabbage Lane, and seldom even got to meetings, but she knew how to pray. And so when the revival was coming on, the deacon took care to tell Aunt Dinah all about it, and ask her to pray for souls. And the old auntie asked about a number of people, Massa So-and-So and Mrs. So-and-So, who passed her little hut on their way daily. Were they Christians? "No," he said. And so, one by one, she counted them up and she told the Lord about them. Scarcely one of their names she knew, and none of them ever heard of her; but when the glad harvest time came and forty souls were gathered into that fold, and old auntie hobbled into the church to see them confess their Lord, she wept with tears of joy, for twelve of them were the people that came by Cabbage Lane, and that daily she had held up to the Master, until the power from on high fell upon them and brought them to the Cross. These are the raindrops that disappear from human ken, but God follows them, and the record yonder will give credit to every silent prayer and falling tear and unknown factor, and then he that sowed and they that reap shall rejoice together.

Much of our work for God must ever be of this character. We cannot crystallize into human statistics and ecclesiastical communion rolls the results of our labor. The best part of it is like water spilt upon the ground. We have watered some of the Lord's plants; the Lord is glorified; the Lord is pleased, and the Lord's heritage that was weary is refreshed. Let that suffice.

THE gradual processes, both of nature and of grace. The rain has to have time for its fruition. First it must water the earth; then the earth must spring forth and germinate; then must come the blade and the bud, and then the seed for the sower and the bread for the eater. It is all there, and yet it takes waiting patience and long delay. There are two kinds of Christian work. There is the quick harvesting which God sometimes gives—the joy of gathering in the laden sheaves. But there is the slow, patient sowing and the long waiting; yes, and the knowledge that another shall reap what we have sown, and that the flowers shall bloom above our dust before the harvest comes. That is the kind of work that needs faith and God. That is the mother's work as she slowly trains for God the life that is to finish her mission when she has passed away. But when the reckoning day shall come, it will be found that both shall share alike in the recompense and the harvest joy.

Let us not forget the intimate connection suggested here between the sowing and the feeding. Seed for the sower reminds us of the worker's trust. Bread for the eater reminds us of the soul's needed portion. We must feed as well as sow. We must prove first the precious bread before we give it to others, and yet we must not forget that it is a trust and not a luxury, given to us that we may feed upon it and then pass it on to the starving world.

THE certainty and efficacy of the result. "It shall not return unto Me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please." No force, even in nature, is ever lost. The whisper that you breathe upon the air in some form will go on forever. The faintest impulse upon the atoms of that ether ocean on which we are sailing through immensity will influence every other atom to all eternity. You may not see the result, but it is traveling on all the same. Every word we speak for God, every prayer we breathe, every touch of a loving hand, every heart throb of sympathy and holy purpose, tells in some way, and will forever tell for God and the betterment of humanity. We do not labor in vain. We cannot fail. The cup of cold water may be given to an unworthy person. The direct purpose we had may seem to be defeated, but God has that act in His holy keeping, and some day we shall meet it again and receive from His hand, with compound interest, the fruit of our investment for Him.

THE transformations of grace. "The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing . . . and instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree." The mountains represent the difficulties, the obstructions, the barriers that meet us in our work. But God will turn these into occasions for praise and monuments of victory, and the very mountains that stopped our way shall break forth before us into singing.

His thoughts are not our thoughts, nor our ways His. By contraries, and in spite of all probabilities, He works His mighty way. Let us, therefore, take Him for the hardest things, and we shall find some day that the very jewels of our crown shall be forged out of the rugged rocks that cut our bleeding feet on life's rough way. Or, to change the figure, the avenues that shall line our palace home shall be planted with the myrtles and the palms which were formed out of the thorns and briars of our earthly lot.

JUST YESTERDAY

By John H. Styles, Jr.

JUST yesterday she held him to her breast,
A tiny, helpless, blue-eyed baby boy,
And dreamed of days when he would stand a man
Before her. Oh, her soul was filled with joy—
Just yesterday!

Just yesterday her loving hands caressed
His tousled, wind-blown hair and freckled face,
And bound the hurts he knew. How tenderly
She kissed each little scratch and bruised place—
Just yesterday!

Just yesterday she saw him graduate
And scarce could realize her boy had come
To manhood's threshold. Oh, her heart beat high
With hope for him, her stalwart, manly son—
Just yesterday!

Just yesterday her country called her boy.
She did not weep or rail at circumstance,
But bravely bade him do his duty clear.
He kissed her; then he went away to France—
Just yesterday!

Just yesterday her hands were hard at work
With bandages; and as she rolled them tight
She whispered: "Maybe they will be for him,
My boy, who's somewhere over there tonight."
Just yesterday!

DAILY MEDITATION

Our Present Helps

SUNDAY March 17. II Tim. 1:16. "He oft refreshed me." The apostle Paul was great in recognizing the springs which welled up and sang in the lives of others. He was a very skilled diviner in discovering hidden waters in other people's fields, and he rejoiced in the bounty, and he drew from its resources refreshment for his own soul. It is easy to recall some of the crowd of eulogies which he has written about the fidelity and ministry of his fellow believers. He is like a pilgrim who has come upon wells of water as he trudged a hard and weary road, and who at every stopping-place has left some recorded message of grateful appreciation.

And surely that is one of the gracious ministries appointed by our Lord. He mediates his inspirations through one soul to another soul. If we ignore or neglect these waters, we are impoverishing our own souls by limiting the Holy One of Israel. Whenever we become spiritually exclusive we rob ourselves of spiritual treasure. If we just journey on alone, and presume to carry all the cordials we need in our own wallet, if we regard ourselves as self-sufficient, and independent of everybody else, our spiritual life is surely shrinking, and we are not growing in the grace and knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. The wells appointed for our nourishment and refreshment are to be found in the lives of others. Every minister of the Gospel can witness to these surprises of discovery. He goes out to make a pastoral call, and lo! the sheep becomes the shepherd.

"All my springs are in thee," cries the psalmist. Yes, and so they are, but sometimes the water comes to us through the medium of our fellows—an Epaphroditus, or a Titus, or a Mary of Bethany, or a Mary Magdalene. God gives us his water, but in the manner of the giving he draws us together in a more intimate fraternity. J. H. J.

Justice and Immortality

MONDAY, March 18. Gen. 18:25. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" The average man has moral intuitions which, if they are not infallible, are usually dependable. If death ends all, if the verdicts of earthly courts are final, if there is no Highest Court in the world to come by which the unrighteous judgments of earthly courts shall be reviewed and reversed, then the universe is not moral, eternal justice fails.

See how often good men suffer and how often evil men flourish; how often men whose hands have taken bribes and whose lips have spoken lies are courted, flattered, sumptuously fed; how often he who keeps his conscience clean is left to fight the battle from the under side.

Dives in purple and fine linen, Lazarus in rags. It is the old, old way, the world's way, but not God's way. It is not right. It requires another world to make it right.

Not that the good man wants revenge, nor that he desires to see the evil man suffer. Let the wicked be happy if he can be, for his time is short. By all the martyr-fires and prison cells and dungeon chains of faithful witnesses to truth, eternal justice promises a world to come. The question of immortality resolves itself, at least in one phase, into this: Is the universe moral? We think it is. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" C. C. A.

The Bridegroom of the Soul

TUESDAY, March 19. Song of Solomon 2:13. "The fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away." The tender scenes which make up the Book of Canticles and are filled with the ardent affection of conjugal love are the strong effort of God to make us understand the imagery which is found everywhere in the Bible and represents Jesus as the Bridegroom of the soul. We sing of "Jesus, Lover of our soul"; we want to "fly to his bosom." The soul that has been garbed in the glory of Jesus' righteousness and stands before her heavenly Liege in the beauty with which he himself has adorned her sees in these bold images no sensuality but only a great and holy truth.

The bondage of winter that bound life with fetters of ice and snow has been broken. So has the winter of our discontent under sin been turned into a glorious summer by the Sun of righteousness that has come with healing in its wings. Out of this dead heart of ours has blossomed a new hope; our cold affections have begun to teem with a new love. The spring of grace has changed our old heart into a garden of God. Like the glorious life that throbs in nature this new life of grace that pulsates in our hearts belongs to God, to Jesus.

Fair are the meadows,
Fairer the woodlands,
Robed in flowers of blooming spring;
Jesus is fairer,
Jesus is purer;
He makes our sorrowing spirits sing.

Uses of Memory

WEDNESDAY, March 20. Psalm 119, 16. "I will not forget Thy Word." Memory may be called the library of the mind, where thoughts are stored; the phonograph of the soul, where voices are echoed, or the photograph of the heart, where loves, friendships are pictured, to adorn forever the gallery of the soul. What a contrast between a loving memory of the true, the beautiful and the good, and the memory of revenge, hate, malice and lust!

Think of turning the portrait of Christ to the wall of forgetfulness, as well as those of our most faithful and dearest friends! Think of trying to forget home, church, country and God, so as to keep more vivid the scenes of revelry and debauchery!

Memory is said to be "the only Paradise from which we cannot be turned out." It is richer than vaults of gold, more lasting than honors, titles or treasures of the world. But it is a monitor as well as a recorder. "Son, remember," is the silver bell of conscience, warning the soul to remember his Creator, and not to forget those dearer to him than life.

A widowed father gave nearly all his earnings for the musical education of his daughter. After ten years of his sacrifice and loneliness, she returned from Europe to thrill with her songs the great audiences that greeted her. But she refused to recognize her humble father in his lowly and penniless condition. Such ingratitude and forgetfulness seem unbelievable. But it is only a sample of the greater sin of forgetting the words and person of the world's Saviour and Friend, who gave us richly all things to enjoy—life, love, happiness and heaven. Forgetting him and his book is the monstrous sin of men.

The Self-Knowledge of the Heart

THURSDAY, March 21. Prov. 14:10. "The heart knoweth its own bitterness." If out of the heart are the issues of life, in the heart is the bitterness of life. These bodies of ours do not trouble us half as much as our hearts. What are the possible sources of heart-bitterness? Certainly one of them is the memory of an imperfect past.

Keen as may be the bitterness of the heart in memory of an imperfect past, keener is the bitterness of the heart which knows itself held in slavery to present sin. The past is beyond recall but the present is still within our grasp. What of this present? Are we free? Is this capacious self of ours a prisoner to its own sordid desires?

It is the peculiar peril of some otherwise radiant personalities that, free from any hideous memory, and free from the domination of present sin, they are in bondage to distressing anxiety about the future. They are in bondage to fear.

Every heart knows its own bitterness, but may it not also be written that some hearts know the cure of their own bitterness? By the bitter fountain of Marah there was a sweetening branch. There is a sweetening branch by the side of every fountain of bitterness in life. And is that sweetening branch not the rood, the Cross of Jesus Christ? The magic of its power clears all the clouds away from the imperfect record of the past, delivers us from the power of present evil thoughts and habits, and gives us hope, a great, strong, beautiful hope for the future, the little future of our years on earth, and the infinite future of life beyond the count of years.

The Brother's Burden

FRIDAY, March 22. Gal. 6:2. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." The apostle is deeply concerned that the mutual relations of Christians shall not be disturbed by a selfish, insolent and sullen temper. There are degrees of spiritual-mindedness: not only does one Christian differ from another in this respect, but there are in the lives of individual Christians seasons when they are more spiritual-minded than at other times. Through ignorance, lack of watchfulness, inherited frailties, plausible temptations, or enticing examples, Christians may fall into an erroneous notion or an immoral act. This may happen more frequently to some Christians than to others, but it does occur in the lives of the best Christians. In such a case the stronger brethren are invited to regard the fault of the weaker brethren as a burden which they must bear.

"Bearing another's burden," however, does not mean to connive at a brother's sinning and to readily condone his offenses, but it means to add one's own strength to the strength of the erring brother which has evidently failed. Those who are advanced and confirmed in knowledge and grace should do their utmost, in a meek, patient, and tender manner, to convince and reclaim the erring brother. The stronger brethren will be powerfully aided in such endeavors by a reflection upon their own weakness, which may cause them to fall before the tempter as easily as the weak brother fell.

It will keep them from being unforgiving, or extremely harsh and censorious. They will with all the power of Christian love in them strive to reclaim the erring brother from his evil way, lead him to a due recognition of the sinfulness of his act and of its fatal tendency.

They will sympathize with the erring brother, offer him their assistance in the spiritual struggle to which they urge him, try to remove dangerous influences to which he is exposed, and break the power of the peculiar temptations which he has to face. Above all, they will carry the trouble of their erring brother to the Lord in prayer and ask Him for wisdom and fraternal devotion, that they may be able to minister counsel and help to their brother in his hour of need.

That is the law which Christ imparted to his disciples in his parting discourse, the law of serving love, by which he said, men would know that they were his disciples indeed.

To Him for Rest

SATURDAY, March 23. Matt. 11:28. "Come unto me and I will give you rest." Several great artists have pictured our Lord with extended arms and loving looks of compassion, as he cries to the multitude, weary and heavy laden, "Come unto me and I will give you rest." The Danish artist Bloch has portrayed Christ in this attitude with a number of persons who have answered his invitation and are now closely standing about his person. One is a criminal, whose hands are bound with chains. He stands in a hesitating way, wondering if he will be received by the divine Master, thinking doubtless in the language of the poet,

Weary of earth and laden with my sin,
I look to heaven and long to enter in;
But there no evil thing may find a home,
And yet I hear a voice that bids me come.

Another, who has just touched the robes of Jesus and is believably resting his head upon the person of the Christ, has an expression of peacefulness and rest beyond words to tell. An old man with his staff sits on the opposite side, reclining against his Saviour, rejoicing that heaven has come down to earth to greet him in his closing years and to open the gates of life to his soul. The mother, daughter and son on the left appear filled with ecstasy at this near vision of the matchless Preacher. How beautiful for the mother to bring the children to him who says, "Son, daughter, give me thy heart!"

No richer words ever fell from lips Divine than these, "I will give you rest." We should emphasize every word in that immortal sentence, for each word stands for an immortality of glory, happiness and blessing for the great family of God. E. W. C.

Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird" and the Story It Tells

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SOME people—many people—know the story of Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird." Everybody should know it. And now that the Arcraft Pictures Corporation has put the story into a perfect picture, there is no reason why every one should not know it.

The story is a simple story—an allegory. Everything in our daily life, including fire, water, bread, sugar, milk, etc., is personified, and a soul given to all. The thread of the story is carried by two children who go in quest of the Blue Bird—meaning Happiness.

The days before Christmas two very human little children, a little boy named Tyltyl and his sister Mytyl, the children of Daddy Tyl and Mummy Tyl, peasants, were envious of the prosperity of the rich children who lived nearby. Madam Berlingot, their neighbor, had a little daughter who was ill, and she asked Tyltyl and Mytyl to let her little girl have their pet dove, which she craved, but the children selfishly declined.

After they are put to bed, the Fairy, Berylune, appears and by means of a magic diamond shows them the souls of all things, which come to life in the shape of symbolical figures. Even the cat and the dog are given the power of speech. The Fairy then takes the children in search of the Blue Bird, and they visit the Palace of Night, where they meet Sleep and Death, and the various sicknesses, the terrible Wars, the Stars, the Dew, etc.

The quest continues to the graveyard, which they reach at midnight. The graves open and the dead come to life, and the cemetery is transformed to a flowery bower. The children again meet their grandparents, long since departed, who express joy that they have not been forgotten. Here they also find their brothers and sisters who have died, and a glad reunion takes place in Memoryland. These scenes are obliterated by the Fog of Forgetfulness, and in the Palace of Luxuries a sumptuous banquet is in progress, the Luxuries gorging themselves with the plentiful food. Seated around the table are the Luxuries of Being Rich, Landowner, Satisfied Vanity, Drinking When Not Thirsty, Eating When Not Hungry, Knowing Nothing, Doing Nothing, Sleeping More Than Necessary, and Fat Laughter, all in symbolical types. The gluttons invite the children to join them, but Light sheds her radiance and the banqueters, unable to withstand the pitiless glare, take refuge in the Cavern of Misery with shrieks of dismay.

In the Cathedral of Happiness the children meet the Joys, including Children's Happiness, Being Well, Loving One's Parents, Pure Air, Blue Sky, The Forest, Sunny Hours, Spring, Rain, and Innocent Thoughts. The Great Joys then appear, including Being Just, earth, and at the doors are the mothers. These children represent all classes, from the humblest worker to the rulers of the earth. Time opens the gate for the children born that day, and they depart, equipped with something to make changed colors, so that the real Blue Bird has not been captured. In the morning the children awaken with different conceptions of life. They greet their parents with affectionate embraces, and everything seems cheerier and brighter to them. Thoughts of the little girl begging for the dove in her semi-delirium induce them to give her the bird, and lo! it turns to a Blue Bird. They have found the Blue Bird of Happiness in making others happy.

The Christian Herald does not often feel that it can heartily endorse a film. For many film stories are, regrettably, not the sort of thing that one could take one's small, or older, son or daughter to see. But the "Blue Bird" is the sort of film that holds a lesson worth learning. It is the kind of a film few people have dreamed of producing—an idealistic picture made real by splendid acting and remarkable photography.

Several points stand out from the story—stand out by sheer beauty of word and action. When the children go at twelve o'clock to the graveyard to see the dead arise—when they tiptoe fearfully in through the door and walk, in frightened silence, past the yawning tombs, one can perfectly understand why folk fear death. But, when suddenly the graves burst forth into blossoms and the roses and lilies grow fragrantly all about, one sees the Easter story re-told in a marvelous way. For the little boy, astounded, asks: "Where are the dead?" and the girl-child, with a triumphant smile upon her face, answers: "There are no dead!"

And then there is the place where the children, in the Palace of the Joys and Delights, meet their mother, who is known there as the Joy of Maternal Love. And she says to them: "Will you recognize me when I am dressed in my faded dress, back in our cottage?"

And the children cry: "But we want to stay here, with you, in Heaven!"

And she smiles and says, "Heaven is every time you kiss me!"

The moving picture has come to stay—come to stay with its unlimited possibilities for good or for evil. And the Blue Bird is the sort of picture that can not fail to do unlimited good. It will be a delight to children, but only the grown-up can read their lives into the search for Happiness. It will be a dream, a fairy-tale come true, to your boy or girl; but to you it will be the meaning of life, told poetically but none the less truly.

The Blue Bird is a milestone in the production of motion pictures. We hope for more pictures of the same sort.

"It is heaven every time you kiss me"

Being Good, Fame, Thinking and the Peerless Joy of Maternal Love, which is symbolized by the mother of Tyltyl and Mytyl, and is seen glorified by mother love.

In the Azure Palace countless unborn children await their advent upon the their marks in the world, for good or evil.

The children, Tyltyl and Mytyl, are taken home by the Fairy, their hunt for the Blue Bird having been fruitless. Many birds have been pursued and caught, but they died immediately and

New Light on the Name of Abraham

By PROFESSOR ALBERT T. CLAY, Yale University

AMONG the recent accessions to the Yale Babylonian Collection a tablet has been found that has important bearing upon the historical value of the Old Testament story of the patriarch Abraham.

Half a century ago the theory was advanced in Germany that the patriarchs were not to be regarded as historical persons. This gave rise to many other efforts on the part of certain scholars, in which it was claimed that the patriarchs were originally deities, who in time were degraded to the ranks of men. Others regarded them as personified clans or tribes. It was in the late days of Israel, they claim, that some Jewish writer "created" the character of Abraham, in order to idealize an ancestor for the nation, and thus projected backward the beginning of the Hebrew race. In other words, this writer of fiction interwove his story of the patriarchs with historical facts, and thus created what has been handed down as history.

It is only necessary to examine certain

Biblical dictionaries and commentaries to see what an effect such efforts have had in relegating the story of the patriarchs to the region of myth or fiction. The fact is that these theories have been popularized to such an extent that they are brought within the understanding of the Sunday school scholar, who is taught not to regard the patriarchs as historical.

IT is impossible to discuss these theories in the compass of this article. It is sufficient, however, to say that they are purely hypothetical, and that they have needed modification, whenever archeology has brought to light any facts bearing upon the question; while, on the other hand, hundreds of facts have been brought to light which show that we have facts of history with which to deal. We have seen these theories advance from the position in which it was declared that the whole historical background of this period in the Old Testament was a creation of the fiction-writer, to the position held at present, that the background is acknowledged to be in strict accordance with fact. They are now willing to admit that archeology has restored the very historical atmosphere for the Old Testament stories; but they add—and here they arrive at the same results—we look in vain for any references to the patriarchs themselves on the monuments. It is scarcely possible that any archeologist will ever expect to find references to the patriarchs on the royal inscriptions of Babylonia or Egypt. But while this is true, many other discoveries have made it perfectly reasonable for any, except those who are skeptically inclined, to believe, without any doubt, that the patriarchs were actually historical personages. One of the discoveries is here set forth.

IT has been urged as one of the arguments of these critics that the name "Abram" was of late origin; that it means Ab, "the father," and ram, "is exalted." Thus the name gives evidence, they have claimed, that the writer coined it for this fictitious ancestor of the Hebrews. Later the argument was modified, and it was held that the name did not occur in inscriptions prior to the tenth century B. C., the earliest occurrence of the name being on the walls of Karnak in Egypt, where Shoshonk, in recording his invasion of Palestine, mentions "the field of Abram" as one of the places he conquered. In the thousands of inscriptions of an earlier period, they claimed, the name is not found. Moreover, the fuller form of the name, i.e., "Abraham," is not found as early as the form "Abram." The argument based on the silence of the inscriptions was here applied, as has so frequently been done, but again it proved to be futile.

A few years ago it was discovered that in several Babylonian tablets from Dilbat, not far from Babylon, a certain Abram is mentioned. The name is written A-ba-am-ra-am and A-ba-am-ra-mu. These tablets were written in the reign of Ammi-Zaduga, king of Babylon, just a little later than the time in which the patriarch lived.

The Babylonian Collection of Yale University possesses several hundred letters of this same period, known as the First Dynasty of Babylon, during which time the patriarch lived. One of these letters was written by Hammurabi, the contemporary of Abram, who is known as Amraphel in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis. In the collection were three letters in their original envelopes of clay. The reason that they remained unopened was doubtless due to the fact that they were exact copies of letters which had been sent, and were preserved in the archives. One was addressed: "To Ibiq-Ea," another to a woman: "To Elmeshum," the third had nothing written on the envelope. All three bore the seals of the senders. They were such fine specimens of cuneiform tablets that at first it was thought advisable to leave them intact for exhibition purposes. Later, however, it was decided to open two and leave the third one intact. Strange as it may seem the one addressed to Elmeshum contained the fuller form of the name of the patriarch, for which archeologists had looked in vain for years.

IN a volume of these texts which has just appeared, entitled "Early Babylonian Letters from Larsa," by Dr. H. F. Lutz, this inscription and the translation are published. It reads as follows: "To Elmeshum thus speaks as follows Sirum. May the gods Shamash and Tak, of the temple Eshara, for my sake preserve thy life forever. Establish according to this fashion thy sisterly relation, for we have grown up together since we were small. Thou hadst acquired since a protective genius. Thou didst not reduce at all the price of 15 she of silver; but yesterday I took Abraham when thou hadst come. Not until thou hadst overcharged me didst thou comply."

The name Abraham is Hebrew or Amoritic, not Babylonian. At the time, many Western Semites were in the land, which fact itself throws light upon the story of Abram's life in Ur of the Chaldees. The individual referred to in the letter may have been a servant. But suffice it to say that we have here the occurrence of the name Abraham, written A-ba-ra-ha-am, in the very period in which the patriarch Abraham lived. In this way one of the chief arguments on which rests the theory of the critics disappears. Moreover, the name does not mean "the father is exalted," but "the father loves," namely, the child to which the name was given.

NO one would attempt to identify the individual who is mentioned in this letter with the patriarch. Doubtless, as the investigations continue, other occurrences of the name will be found in the tablets of that period, for, as mentioned, the land of Babylon was full of Western Semites at that time. It is not impossible, if the city Ur in Southern Babylonia prove to be Ur of the Chaldees—as it is regarded by many scholars—that tablets will be found in the ruins of that city in which the names of the family of Terah occur. Discoveries quite as remarkable and as romantic as this have actually been made. But this would simply put the capstone upon the mass of archeological evidence that has been gathered, upon which rests the belief in the historicity of the patriarchs.

Chinese Concordance Completed

AFTER twelve long years of labor on his own part and that of a number of Chinese helpers, the Rev. Henry G. C. Hallock, Ph.D., of Shanghai, China, saw the completion of his Concordance of the Bible in Chinese. Writing to a friend in America on the past 29th of November he said: "This is Thanksgiving Day and I have special cause for thanksgiving. The first copy, completed, of the third and last volume of my Chinese Concordance of the Whole Bible was delivered to me today, and I have O. K'd it for the binders. . . . God has healed, has renewed my youth, until the work is done—after twelve years. I am more grateful than I can tell."

Dr. Hallock is a member of the Presbytery of Steubenville (Ohio) and has been a missionary in China for nearly twenty-two years, most of the time at Shanghai. His Concordance is being issued in three volumes of one thousand pages each, and contains five million Chinese characters. It contains four hundred thousand direct and indirect Bible references. It follows the Radical order of characters, and is the first and only concordance in the language after what we know as the Word Plan, like Cruden's or Strong's. It will meet a long-felt need. It is just what the Chinese preachers, teachers, helpers, Sunday-school teachers, Bible-women, Christian Endeavorers and all literate Chinese Christians need in the study of God's Word. Twelve years of closest application and many thousands of dollars have been required for its preparation and printing. One of his fellow missionaries on the field, Rev. J. W. Davis, D.D., Ph.D., wrote to Dr. Hallock saying: "Accept my congratulations on finishing this work. It is the hardest job yet done by any missionary and reflects honor on the whole body."

Important features of the work are that it contains a dictionary in Chinese, a dictionary in English, a text-book of Bible names, an index according to Radicals, an index according to the number of strokes, an index according to the Peking Romanization and an index according to Standard Romanization. If one knows any character in a Bible verse, he can find the verse.

To illustrate what the book means to the Chinese, the author tells this story: "A senator requested his secretary to look up a verse of Scripture that he wished to quote in an important speech. The secretary was out for a few hours. On returning he was asked for the passage. The secretary replied that he had read through Genesis, Exodus and Leviticus without result, but would doubtless find it ere he had read through the Bible. He was curtly directed to look up the Concordance. Never heard of such a book! It was pointed out. The passage was found within three minutes!"

Dr. Hallock is founder and now secretary and treasurer of the National Tract Society for China, and is issuing the Concordance at cost price, in order that it may be widely used. He says of it: "My one ambition has been and is to have it inexpensive—for the good of all—in the reach of all."

For fourteen years Dr. Hallock has issued a Chinese Christian Almanac, of which several million copies have been sold, the circulation now being over three hundred thousand per year. It is a booklet of nearly one hundred pages, printed in the Chinese character, and sells for what would be about two cents in our money. It is in use among the native Christians all over China. Dr. Hallock has also written many tracts in Chinese and not a few hymns, especially hymns for Sunday-school use. He conducts a number of Sunday-schools in the native districts of Shanghai, having over eleven hundred pupils. He has a Sailor's Home, and also does evangelistic work, street and chapel preaching among the Chinese in Shanghai. He is a native of Steubenville, Ohio, and has three brothers in the Presbyterian ministry, Rev. Dr. G. B. F. Hallock, of Rochester, N. Y., Rev. Dr. Robert C. Hallock, of Dundee, N. Y., and Rev. William A. Hallock, of Honeoye Falls, N. Y.

Pyrex makes all your undercrusts crisp and brown like the top

"Won't it break when I put it cold into my oven?" you ask. No, it won't. It would not break even if you put it to the severe test shown in this photograph

From freezing to boiling without breaking

Heat expands—cold contracts. That is why sudden change of temperature breaks any ordinary glass. Pyrex contracts so slightly that sudden heat cannot break it.

Pyrex dishes never burn out, corrode, flake or craze. They cannot rust, discolor or absorb odors. After years of service your Pyrex will be clean—perfect, as it was the day you bought it.

Makes food more delicious

Everything you cook in Pyrex is more delicious. For example, try baking two loaves of bread, one in any ordinary pan, the other in Pyrex—bake them at the same time with the same amount of dough in each dish. You will be amazed to see the difference. The Pyrex loaf will rise much higher. It will be an even brown all over. The texture of each slice will be fine, even, perfect.

Scientists tell us that only one-third of the oven heat can get through a metal pan.

When you cook in Pyrex the food inside gets all the heat instead of just one-third. This is why every food cooked in Pyrex is so thoroughly, so evenly cooked, why it is so much more delicious, why so much less fuel is needed.

Dealers everywhere sell Pyrex

Each dish is guaranteed not to break in the oven. Find out for yourself how well it wears, how much better it makes food, how much easier it is to clean. See for yourself how attractive, how appetizing it makes things look.

By PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON, Author of "In His Steps"

HOWARD had at last come to the place where he could not escape his own conviction that Agnes Burton was necessary to him. The events of the winter had made it more and more clear to him in a multitude of ways that cried out with insistent clamor for her to come and stand by his side and be his helpmeet. And he had begun to hope from more than one tone or look that Love's song was not far from her lips if once he should go to her boldly.

But now! What could he offer her! He was a beggar! Actually a beggar! He support a wife! Why, in a few days he would not be able to pay for the bread on his own simple table! He a married man! And this church, that had made a definite pledge to him in writing to pay him a certain wage for his services, did not think his services worth enough to keep its word, and expected him to live on promises and excuses, and yet it would criticize him if he did not pay his bills or did not keep up with his outward appearance and his outlay for books and study that was required of an educated minister of the Gospel.

He went out of the house one evening at this time the day after he had drawn his last bank deposit, and, telling Rose he was going down town after the mail, he walked along through the dimly lighted streets, fear and shame and humiliation tugging at his heart.

There was only one letter for him, a long envelope with the magazine's letter-head across the corner.

He had not written them anything for several weeks, and out of curiosity to see what they were writing him for, he paused by the little desk near the door and opened the envelope.

Its contents startled him. He read the closely typewritten pages over again, and he was absorbed in the contents when some one going out close by him caused him to look up.

It was Miss Burton. He took off his hat and said good evening. She returned his greeting, and they walked out of the post office together, Howard still holding in his hand the letter from the magazine, and in spite of the presence of the school teacher so near him—or was it because of it?—deeply pondering on the way which had suddenly opened for him a new career in life.

CHAPTER X

THE distance from the post office to the Congregational parsonage was only five blocks, but enough happened in that distance to make future history of tremendous importance for two lives in this story. As they came to the first corner where there was a street lamp, Miss Burton could not help seeing the envelope which Howard was holding rather awkwardly in front of him as he strode along. Under the stress of his emotions caused by Miss Burton's presence and the contents of the long envelope, he was swinging along at a rather rapid gait.

They had walked as far as the corner of a second block with the exchange of only commonplaces when she said:

"I thought I recognized an article of yours in that magazine last week, Mr. Chase. You do write for it, don't you?"

"Yes. What was the name of it?"

"A New Religion."

"What would you think," he said suddenly, as if a sudden resolve had seized him right there, "of the influence a writer in such a paper might exercise, compared with, say, a minister's position?"

THE question was so abrupt and so strange that she did not answer instantly.

"Why," she said, as they passed another corner, "it would be an important position and a great place for influence.

But is any place equal to that of the ministry?"

"Yes. That is— Yes. I don't see why it isn't. The printed page reaches more people. It speaks oftener. And I don't see why it isn't the greater pulpit."

"Perhaps it is," she said, a feeling of uneasiness beginning to creep over her. "But I supposed you chose the ministry because you were convinced it was the greatest career a man could choose."

"I did, Miss Burton. But I don't know but I may change my mind." He went on speaking half in his abstracted manner, and half as if he felt her interest in the matter. "Do you know what is in that envelope?"

He held out the letter in front of him, and stared at it as if he needed the assurance of its sight to persuade himself he had received it.

"No, of course. I—" she shrank away from him a little, as a cold fear crept over her in anticipation of what was coming.

"Well, I may as well confess to you first of all—I—that letter contains an invitation to me from the editor to come on the staff of the magazine as the Social Life editor at a salary of $2,500 a year, and I've about made up my mind to accept."

"You—have—made up your mind—to—"

SHE stammered, and if Howard had been able to see her face he would have noted the fear and surprise on it. The confession smote her cruelly. The thought that he was planning to leave Red Hill, the added thought that financial motives were tempting him, the thought that he was going to give up his career in the ministry, affected her so profoundly that after her first exclamations she walked on in silence, trying vainly to still the quick throbbing of her pulses.

"Yes," he went on, still speaking more to himself than to her, "I believe I'll accept it. I've done my work here."

"Done your work here! Oh, Mr. Chase! You have only just begun! You have only—"

She did not dare go on, her voice shook so.

"Pardon me," he said gently, as if coming back out of his abstraction. "I don't know just why I have told you this. It came to me as a great surprise only a few minutes ago. Somehow I seemed impelled to say what I did. There are reasons why I am making this decision. Some time I may be able to tell you more fully."

For a moment he looked at her with a look she longed to interpret, but they had reached the parsonage, and Rose was out on the little porch.

"O Howard!" she called, "Mrs. Wilson sent word down to ask if you wouldn't go and see Lida. She seems worse, and is calling for you."

Little Miss Wilson had been neglected of late, but her illness had been one of the sorrowful results of the carelessness of the town authorities, for all during Howard's struggle, and long after he was convalescent, little Miss Wilson had continued to lie in the grip of the fever or its after effects. All through the fall, and now into the winter, she had lain like a wee small white blossom, a lesion of the heart sapping the childish frame.

AND all through that time, after Howard was out and at his energetic task again, it had been his almost daily habit to stop in and see Miss Wilson on his way down town. They had grown to be great friends. And Mrs. Wilson in a moment of remorse, during one of those visits, had made full and tearful confession of her part in the gossip about Inez, and Howard had, of course, cheerfully and fully forgiven her.

He brought little Miss Wilson funny pictures and bits of interesting fossils he found on the bluff and odd little tricks he had learned, and her trembling hold on life, "Doc" Vaughn told the Agent, was, he believed, actually due to Howard's calls.

So tonight, with an abrupt farewell to Miss Burton, he turned toward the Wilsons'.

Rose invited Miss Burton to come in and look over some music. She hesitated, but finally came in, and Rose was startled by her look as she came into the sitting-room.

"What's the matter?"

"Oh, nothing."

But Rose knew it was something, for as the time in Red Hill had sped on, she had guessed the school teacher's heart, and the two had grown to have deep affection for each other, but no open word of confidence about Howard had as yet passed between them.

They looked over the music a few minutes and then Rose expressed a wish to try it out over in the church with the organ, and as the room had been warmed for some afternoon gathering, they went over and practised for a little while.

Miss Burton, however, was evidently so indifferent to the music, and so distracted by something else, that Rose finally stopped in her singing and said:

"You're not looking at all well. Let's go over to the house, and when Howard comes back we'll have a cup of tea together. Come, dear. And if you're in trouble, let me—"

They were out in the little yard, and as they crossed over it, Agnes Burton made a resolve. They were hardly in the parsonage before she turned to Rose. As they came in Rose noticed that Howard's study door was ajar, but there was no light in the room. Agnes was clutching Rose by the arm, and saying,

"I can't keep it to myself any longer. I'm as bad as Inez. But, oh, Rose, did you know your brother is planning to leave Red Hill and the ministry, and I can't bear to think of his going—"

"I know all about your feelings," said Rose calmly. "But the other is news to me. What do you mean by 'leaving Red Hill and the ministry'?"

"He told me himself on the way from the post office. He has received an offer from a prominent magazine to go on the editorial staff at $2,500 a year, and he has decided to accept the offer, resign his ministry and go away!"

ROSE CHASE was a young woman who had seen so much trouble of a peculiar kind that her mind was steady and her heart not easily disturbed. She heard the news from Agnes without any great excitement, and her response to her friend's agitation almost shocked her.

"If Howard has decided on that, I don't blame him. Twenty-five hundred dollars is more than he would ever get in Red Hill if he stayed here twenty-five hundred years."

"I didn't suppose," Miss Burton began falteringly, "that financial reasons could tempt your brother. I—that is—I supposed he was committed to the ministry for life—that he—"

And at that point Rose forgot herself for a moment, as the thought of Howard's self-denial and his financial struggle rushed over her.

"And why should not a minister have some financial ambitions like other men? Do you know the church has not paid Howard a cent for more than five weeks? He has spent his last dollar to help—we haven't anything saved up. Why shouldn't he begin a career in a position where he can earn a living like other men, instead of breaking his heart over an impossible situation! You know, Agnes, that this church would let my brother go on preaching here indefinitely, until he grew useless in the ministry, and never offer to pay him a cent more than he is getting now. Churches all over Kansas do that to their ministers. Can you blame him for not being willing to go on living a life of such humiliation? I hope he will accept the offer and leave Red Hill. It doesn't appreciate him enough even to pay him his pitiful little wages!"

Rose glowed with righteous wrath as she spoke, and Agnes, her face white, and her eyes staring at the unusual sight of gentle-spirited Rose towering up in anger for her brother, gasped for breath, and when Rose ceased she finally cried:

"Oh, Rose! How cruel! I didn't know! I had no idea he was living under such— Oh, forgive me, dear! To think that I was judging him to be mercenary! To think that he whom I love more than life—"

AND at that point both young women were startled by the sight of a person coming out of the little study, and Howard was there standing in the doorway, one hand on the edge of the door as if to steady himself, and his clear gaze fixed on his sister.

"We didn't know you were there, did we, Agnes?" Rose managed to gasp.

Agnes's reply was inaudible. "I went up to the Wilsons', but the doctor was with Lida and said it was best for me not to see her tonight. And so I came right back here, and went into the study to do some thinking. I didn't mean to hear anything I ought not—"

"Oh, well, you and Agnes can untangle it. I wash my hands of the whole affair," said Rose shamelessly. And with the words she retired to the kitchen, the door to which she closed with a good decisive bang as she disappeared.

WHEN, after considerable moving about of dishes, pots and pans, she finally came into the sitting-room after knocking discreetly on the kitchen door, Howard opened it, embraced her, and then with his well-known grin, a chastened and glorified grin, turned and presented her to the young woman standing there, blushing and tearful, but transfigured, with the words:

"Rose, here is your sister that is to be. There didn't seem to be any other way to untangle the matter. We discussed the situation from every angle, but after what Agnes said to you, and what I have been saying to her, there seemed no other way out but to get married so we could discuss it without being overheard the rest of our lives."

"And is she going to be a minister's wife, or an editor's wife?" asked Rose a little later, as she poured out tea and watched the lovers, with a delight she did not attempt to conceal.

"That's a matter we haven't decided yet," said Howard. "I feel like leaving it to Agnes."

"And I'm perfectly willing to leave it to Howard," said the school teacher, the roses on her cheeks and the starlight in her eyes.

"Well!" exclaimed Rose. "If you two keep on like that all your married life, you'll never get anywhere."

"We don't want to get anywhere, do we, Agnes?" Howard said. "One place is as good as another now."

"You'll be needing a hired girl, no matter where you are," said Rose gently. "And they're scarce. I wonder if I can apply for the position. Best of references, of course."

"You're engaged right now," said Agnes.

WHEN Agnes and Howard reached the deacon's, it was still early, and as they came in, Deacon Burton and his wife were seated at the dining-room table, the deacon reading a Kansas City daily, and Mrs. Burton sewing in her leisurely, quiet manner. It was a perfect picture of happy married life, and the lovers exchanged glances in one swift moment, each silently revealing to the other what it meant in future vision of their own home.

Deacon and Mrs. Burton were always glad to see Howard, and tonight they greeted him heartily and asked him to take off his overcoat and spend the evening.

Howard complied with the request to remove his coat, and sitting down in front of his deacon he said gravely,

"Deacon Burton, did you know there was a movement on foot in our parish, a determined movement, to break up our chorus?"

"No! Why, it can't be! The chorus is perfectly harmonious! Agnes! What—"

The deacon paused, puzzled by a look in his daughter's face, and Mrs. Burton, who had dropped her sewing at Howard's abrupt statement, gazed keenly from him to Agnes with a dawning knowledge. But the deacon still faced Howard questioningly.

"You are likely to lose your organist, I think. She has been invited to go to Boston, and she has promised to go if she can get the consent of her parents."

Mrs. Burton had risen, and Deacon Burton was fumbling with his glasses, as Howard went over to Agnes, and the two stepped around in front of him, Agnes blushing and tear-gleaming as her father held out both hands to the minister.

"I don't care what happens to the chorus. A duet like this suits me, all right. Been praying for it ever since you came."

"So have I!" said Mrs. Burton, boldly.

"Mother!" Agnes said, as her mother came and put her arms around her, while Howard, after a moment, spoke the same word.

Deacon Burton was so excited that he tried to mop his forehead with the newspaper. And when Howard finally went away, the good deacon with a faltering voice put his hand on his shoulder and said,

"My son, I don't know another man in the world I would rather trust her with than with you. This is a happy day for mother and me."

BUT when the family was alone, Agnes Burton came and stood before her father, and there was a gleam in her eye that revealed the trait that had given her such a unique standing with the people of Red Hill, a perfect passion for truth and justice and fair dealing, so strong and aggressive that it seemed more masculine than feminine. She was happy tonight, happier than she had ever been in all her life, in the love of a strong and splendid life, and her heart sang hosanna over it. But she was also indignant, with a glorious anger that transfigured her.

"Father!" she said, and her voice and gesture were eloquent with her new experience, "Do you know that our church is going to lose the best minister it ever had or ever will have, because it is so selfish and mercenary that it will not even take the pains to pay him promptly the pitiful salary it promised him?"

"What! Not pay him! Not pay him!"

"Yes! I have learned tonight that Mr. Chase—Howard—has not had a cent from the church for more than five weeks."

"Then Deacon Allen is to blame," said her father, the angry color rising on his brow. "This is his way of showing his feeling towards—"

"No. No, father! I don't believe Deacon Allen would do that! It's all a part of our miserable, narrow, unjust view of the minister and his service. You know for years we have always treated all our ministers this way. And it isn't because we are poor and don't have the money. Look at the men in our church. There's Deacon Allen himself. Worth twenty thousand—"

"Thirty," said her father shortly.

"And Judge Vail. He has just bought a new car."

"Yes, paid $1,950 for it. He told me himself."

"And there's Mr. Yoder, and Mr. Claridge, and Mr. Allston and Mr. Myron and Mr. Colfax, well-to-do farmers. Any one of them could pay a thousand dollars a year to the church and never feel it, and you told me yourself, father, that not one of those men ever pledges over ten a year. Think of it! Ten dollars a year for services like Howard's."

And they don't pay that on time, or until our regular annual appeal to make up the deficit. And look at the money the farmers are making over their wheat and butter and eggs and meat! And the church gets a pittance. I tell you, father, I am not going to stand in the way of my husband going out of the ministry into something else, if the church does not think enough of him to pay him, not what he's worth—they couldn't raise enough in Kansas to do that—but to give him a laborer's fair wages, and pay them on time."

DEACON BURTON looked at her with a gleam of admiration. Then he turned to his wife.

"Isn't she splendid! Mother, I don't think the minister made any mistake. She'll look after his material interests if he is too spiritual to do it himself."

"Yes, I certainly will, father. But I don't believe you and mother or the church realizes the conditions. I say Red Hill will lose the best and most useful man who ever came into it, just because it is so mercenary that it will not pay for the best."

"You said, and he said tonight, something about going away. I didn't take it seriously. Daughter, tell me what you mean."

"I mean, father, that Howard has a splendid offer to go on a leading magazine as one of the editors at a salary of $2,500 a year."

"Twenty-five hundred! You don't think our church could ever pay a sum like that, do you?"

"I do! They are amply able to do it. Of course I know they won't. And Howard would not expect it. But he has a perfect right to make his choice."

Deacon Burton sat there eyeing the passionate figure, his gray eyes thoughtful, his mouth stern. At last he said, "I don't blame you, daughter. There is something wrong with our Christianity when we pay thousands for material things and hundreds for the spiritual and eternal. There is one thing we can do, and that is, to live up to our contract with Mr. Chase; and I'll see that within twenty-four hours his salary is paid."

"Oh, father!" Agnes was down on the floor by his knees, putting her hands on his face, looking up at him like a child.

"I am not pleading for justice for him because he is too feeble to do his own, but because I feel the cruelty of it all. As Rose told me tonight—I almost choked as she hinted—they are supporting some one— Then, proudly: "He is a man. I am proud of him. He is able to make his way. Look at this offer! And he told me himself that if it had not come he would never have asked me to be his wife. But now—now—yes, father, if he should choose, I will go with him—yes, to the end of the earth I will go."

"Mother and I hope you would," the deacon said, tears coursing over his face. "He is a man! And Red Hill will, I hope, some time find it out."

"But they will not find it out until it is too late, father. He's proud, in the right way. I don't want him to leave the ministry or Red Hill. But it is the only way he can make a living or maintain his self-respect. You cannot blame him, and the church cannot criticize him for leaving."

"I'll see to that salary," Deacon Burton said as Agnes rose and went over and sat down by her mother. "And I'll see that Deacon Allen—"

WHEN Howard reached the parsonage he sat up with Rose late, going over the great experience of the evening. Rose found that, instead of being thrust out of the circle, she was included more affectionately within it, if that were possible.

Howard Chase went into his study and sat at his little desk, his eyes on the picture of his Lord, his whole being moved by the great joy that had come to him that night, and finding his soul responding to the spiritual emotions that were a real and healthy part of him.

He was, in one true sense, awed by what had come to him. He had not intended to speak to Miss Burton until he had decided on his future. But his chance knowledge of her own feeling coming to him as he sat there in the darkness of his study, the sure knowledge that he held in his own hand the ability to make her a home, the insistent cry of his own need of her added to all the rest, had precipitated his action, and she had pledged herself to him with sacred, joyful, tearful consecration of all she was, to be his wedded wife, no matter what his decision as to his future. She trusted him fully, and believed in him implicitly. And it was that great fact more than anything else that awed and humbled him now in the midst of his great joy. Before he retired that night, there in the little study he fell on his knees before his desk and thanked the good God for the priceless boon of a woman's love.

Next evening, while Howard was in his study, the bell rang, and going to the door, he faced Deacon Allen.

There was a queer look on the deacon's face, as if the day had contained some unusual experiences.

HE sat down, and after mopping his brow with an unusually big handkerchief he put his hand in his coat pocket and brought out an envelope.

"There is your back salary and a month in advance, Brother Chase. I regret, the church regrets, the inconvenience we may have caused you by our delay in making you the payment."

"Thank you," said Howard simply. And he added frankly, "The money will be very acceptable, I assure you, and I appreciate the advance payment."

Deacon Allen gazed at him seriously.

"I trust, Brother Chase, that you are not thinking of leaving us, that you are not planning to go away. We need you here."

"I have not made up my mind, yet, what I shall do," Howard replied gravely.

"Of course, we can never pay you what you could get elsewhere," the deacon continued, looking wistfully at Howard. "We know that quite well, and we wouldn't want to stand in the way of your advancement. But we need you here, and it would be a great loss if you should leave us."

"You don't mean, Deacon Allen, that you would miss me personally. Just think! You wouldn't have to be worried over my theology any more."

Howard said it, not flippantly at all, but with a frank good nature that Deacon Allen had at last come to understand.

The old man gazed at him seriously. Then a rare smile crossed his plain face. His lips quivered, and the next instant a tear, a real human tear, dropped down on his rough, wrinkled hand.

It was so eloquent of the deacon's real feeling that Howard did not know what to say or how to act. At last he put out his strong right hand and laid it gently on Deacon Allen's. And the old man understood, and from that hour a friendship was cemented between the old and the new man that I verily believe nothing, not even the use of any number of unauthorized versions of the Bible, will ever destroy.

Next day all Red Hill knew that the minister was engaged to Miss Burton, or that she was engaged to him, or that both of them were engaged.

And to do Red Hill justice, it was honestly and cheerfully and unanimously in favor of the engagement. As the Expressman said to the Agent:

"They needn't put off the wedding on our account. I never did believe in these long engagements. It's an awful waste of flowers and candy and electricity an'—"

"What do you know about it?" interrupted the Agent. "You never was engaged except to get trunks down to the station."

"You don't have to be everything to know something," replied the Expressman. "But there's a thing worryin' me some. Have you heard Mr. Chase is likely to leave Red Hill and go away after he's married?"

"No. 'Tain't true."

"Maybe not. But I got it pretty straight. He's goin' onto some magazine or other down East. They've offered him $5,000 a year. The church couldn't raise that much in a lifetime. That is, not all to onset."

"I don't believe Mr. Chase'll go just for money."

"No. But he might go for other reasons. But I hope he won't. We need him here."

WITHIN the next two days all Red Hill, including the country districts, knew that Howard Chase, the Congregational minister, was likely to leave and go back East, taking his wife with him. For once Red Hill began to wake up to the value of an individual, as well as to an acre of land or a bushel of wheat or a fat hog. Groups of farmers discussed the story, going over the probability. Howard's future salary had now grown from $5,000 to $12,000 and even $15,000 a year. Most people did not blame him for going. The church people discussed the question gravely, but there was no general agreement among them as to any course of action to keep Brother Chase with them. If he had an offer like that, it was out of the question to prevail on him to remain in Red Hill.

Howard himself faced a real crisis, and was deeply concerned over it. The letter must be answered, and he was not clear in his heart or mind as to the right answer. He talked it over one evening with Agnes. Rose was present at the request of each of them. Howard had frankly told Agnes about Cousin Alfred and the poorhouse.

"No one can know this but ourselves," Howard had said. "But it is of no use to conceal the practical facts, or deny that the expense of Cousin Alfred's care will be heavy. The question is whether I can meet it with my salary here, and keep up my own expenses, and keep out of debt. I would almost as soon be in the poorhouse as in debt. And besides, I have a wife to support now. Or shall have soon." (It was now March, and they had fixed on the first of May for the wedding.) "And I can support her on this offer."

They were sitting in the little study and Howard laid his hand on the envelope which lay on his desk.

"I don't see any other way," Rose said. "The church will never offer you any more than you are getting now. You cannot afford, either of you, to refuse this offer. It will never come to you again."

HOWARD looked first at his sister and then at Agnes. Agnes Burton returned his look with perfect understanding of what he now said.

"I made the ministry my choice. I deliberately went into it, knowing its hardships and its small financial returns. It will always be this way. I have a hunger to preach. I love people. I seem to feel as if I were breaking a sacred vow to God if I leave the ministry to go into an editor's sanctum. But I don't know just what else I can do under the circumstances. Agnes, I wish—I wish you could decide it for me."

"Howard! I will go where you go. I will accept your decision as my own. I have no choice but yours!"

"But," said practical Rose, "I don't see that there is any choice, really. Howard cannot meet his obligations on the salary here. He can meet them with the editor's salary. And while I know he is born to preach and do parish work, and ought not to go out of the ministry, what else can he do?"

They talked over the matter from every angle. And when Howard came back from Deacon Burton's after going home with Agnes, he went over it again with Rose.

"I might write more," he had said, "and in that way perhaps make enough to keep Cousin Alfred."

Rose had doubted this, but Howard had held to it with some emphasis.

He went into his study after Rose had retired, and eyed the envelope as if it were a live thing tormenting him. Suddenly he knelt and spread his hands out over his desk, the envelope under them. Then, when he rose, he seemed to have fully made up his mind.

He directed an envelope to the magazine editor, and then began a letter.

He had written two or three sentences, when a gentle rap at the door brought him out into the sitting-room.

Mr. Wilson was on the porch.

"We think Lida is dying, Mr. Chase. Could you come up?"

Without a word Howard put on his hat and coat, and went out with Mr. Wilson, leaving his unwritten letter lying on his desk.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

IT took place on a rainy evening—the adventure in neighboring I am going to tell you about: on such a dismal night indeed that, as I boarded a car in the darkness and rain, I almost regretted I had promised to be present.

For the adventure I was hastening to was an entertainment for the men of the Bowery Mission, gotten up by a young business woman of the Christian Herald whose friends had generously consented to give of their talent. The idea delighted me. But such a night! I wondered if either performers or audience would come.

The Bowery Mission is situated on the East Side, so the ride to it is rather a depressing one. To make matters worse, I took the wrong car, and had quite a walk through narrow, dark streets, where occasional flashes of light from swinging saloon-doors or dingy shops revealed the wet pavement and the fine rain and the hunch-shouldered men and boys who slouched past in twos and threes.

The mournful dripping sounds, the sordidness of everything, the discouraged look of those muffled figures: all these filled me with a horror of the place and a great pity for these men and boys who had drifted here from every corner of the earth.

It occurred to me to wonder just what the Bowery Mission meant to them. I had never been to the Mission, although I had heard about its wonderful work for years. Yet, as I threaded my way through those bleak, terrible streets, I was overwhelmed with doubt. It seemed to me nothing could possibly penetrate the despair I read in the faces of the men and boys who seuffed by.

In this mood I plunged from the darkness of a side street into a cheerful, down-at-heel avenue lined with bright stores. Over it the elevated trains rumbled. Along it street cars clanged. And across it some late arrivals were hurrying into the doorway of the Bowery Mission.

With the hope of finding at least a few benches filled, I entered. The sight that took my breath was a great, beautiful, white-stone hall, literally packed with men and boys—rows upon rows of them, crowding the benches from where I stood clear up to the far-off platform. A few men turned as I entered. And what faces! It seemed to me as if all the defeat and bitterness in the world burned in them.

In a daze I followed the usher to where some other Christian Herald workers sat (the only women in that great hall of uncouth, disheveled, hard-eyed men), and the program began.

It was an amazingly good program: from violin solo and recitations to final ballad. And the men, avid, absorbed, drank it all in hungrily.

Deeply moved, I watched them. And never shall I forget how their tense muscles relaxed, their faces softened, their eyes lost the set stare of bitterness and discouragement. At last "Mother Machree" was sung—by a sweet, womanly girl, such as many of those defeated men had known in a better, manlier past. I suppose that song hurt: bringing back memories of mother or sister which had lain forgotten for years. At any rate, when the singer urged all to join in the chorus, many seemed unable to utter a word. One tousle-haired young fellow, with smoldering black eyes, sat staring at the floor.

Other songs followed: nursery ballads, some quaint old-English lyrics; and at last—sung straight into the bitter hearts of those crushed men and boys on that rainy night in a city's slums—a song with a message of hope that rang like a trumpet out over that sea of upturned faces: a song about the goodness of God!

It was sung twice, and the second time shoulders straightened, mouths tightened more resolutely, the very atmosphere of the East Side seemed to lift, letting in the sunlight of "another chance."

This was followed by a hymn, in which all joined.

The program over, their spiritual needs met, the men formed in line for the bread and hot coffee their undernourished bodies craved. And thus ended the most heart-rending and beautiful adventure I have ever been privileged to witness: an adventure carried out by one young member of the Christian Herald Family in the Mission that is a monument to a departed member.

AND now, dear neighbors, let us turn over to a brighter page in life's book: to the remarkable story of how a little rural community of one hundred souls struggled to have educational and religious advantages.

Building Schoolroom and Church

In 1911 we had, in our little town, a two-story, shakily frame building; the lower story used for church, the upper for school purposes. The building was very uncomfortable and badly in need of repairs which the residents felt unable to afford. However, on Thanksgiving Day of that year, the house caught fire, and teacher and pupils were barely saved.

In 1912 we organized a Sunday school. A physician (a non-professor), kindly tendered us the use of the upper story of his office as Sunday school room. The place was unsafe for a large crowd, so we could not have church service. We women tried to entice the men to build; but could not. So we took the business in hand. We also wanted to provide a place where school could be held; as the children of the town were having to get their schooling in outhouses as a makeshift.

We hired a contractor to build a house for about $700. The men helped with this. And here we had school every day, and church and Sunday school on Sundays. After a little, however, this place proved inadequate, for we wanted to have the Baptist Association with us. So we rallied and talked about building a real church. The war was almost on us then; and some were panic-stricken. I think we would have been afraid to undertake such a task, if one brave woman had not stood up and "spoken in meeting," declaring: "If we say we will build a church we can do it!" She is the wife of the physician who let us have his office for Sunday school meetings.

We made this same doctor chief builder and architect then and there; and now we have a neat brick building with steel ceiling, acetylene lights, basement with furnace, and nice, curved, highly polished gum pews. We had the Association, and Good Cheer, with us last month. Today that physician is a church member and our Sunday school superintendent.

We built this church without having bazaars, suppers or grab bags. We simply put our hands in our pockets, paying as we went.

The population of our town is about one hundred. Our church numbered only six male members and twenty females before our last revival, August 1917. Our church building, with the furnishings and the doctor's work, has cost us about two thousand dollars. We are now planning toward the purchase of an instrument for music.

Can any rural church beat this? And wasn't the burning of the old house a blessing in disguise? MRS. E. J. WILBOURN.

THIS brings us, dear neighbors, to a brief adventure which delighted me: especially the part about that little rural schoolhouse and the loving aid given it. I want more such accounts. Won't you send them to me?

Helping a Rural School

We are a little club of farm women, in a rural section of Maryland. One of the first things we did, after organizing, was to "pool" our magazines: which means much to country women with a limited home book-shelf and very little spending money. Later on, one of our members heard of a library in a nearby city that was willing to send discarded books to clubs or societies. We wrote, asking for a few, and received a generous boxful, among them a number of juvenile books. These books for little folks we carried to a dreary, decrepit rural school, where they were vociferously welcomed. Such a needy, unattractive school that was: without one redeeming feature to cause lagging little feet to hasten! We felt sorry, and determined to see what we could do. First we added curtains, then a picture or two, and finally a "first aid" box; and we hope to do more, for our little club is helping to develop a community spirit here; and we are all beginning to realize that if we lack good roads, good schools, in fact all good things, the fault is ours. We must not give our moral support alone, but must (to quote the pledge of one of the largest societies in the civilized world) "look up, lift up and lend a hand." MRS. ED. LOVETT.

AND now, fellow Adventurers, we have come to the end of this week's visit, except for our Forum, which every week is growing in importance and interest. I want to thank all the generous neighbors who have so lovingly contributed to it, and also to urge others to do so.

Your plans for our "American Community Club" are coming in a steady stream, which will, I hope, continue while the contest lasts.

I would like, furthermore, to thank the following for sending in their "adventures in neighboring": Mrs. J. Garret Kemp; Mr. Wm. A. Shinn; Mrs. Cora Powers; L. E. W.; Mr. Leonard J. Priestly; L. E. M.; Mrs. N. W. Kuhn; Alice M. Howe; Mrs. A. H. R.; Miss Helen A. Hutchinson; A. P. W.; Mr. Melven Booth; Mr. Theo. J. Bodner; Mrs. O. L. McReynolds; Mrs. Carl Peterson; Mrs. L. C. Keek; Miss J. L. A.; Mrs. W. A. Wilson; Mrs. E. C. Dana; Mrs. James Baley; Miss June Rose; Mary Weinck; and a host of other neighbors whose names I have not room to list today. Just what adventures in neighboring, out of all these, I shall be able to use, it is impossible to tell. But I wish to express my appreciation of every neighbor's desire to be of service.

Neighbor's Forum

This is not an Adventure in Neighboring. I just thought I'd like to tell you about a bunch of girls (The Polio Club), all of whom had infantile paralysis in 1916. Our club began by another girl and I being introduced by letter.

Although separated by a whole state, and though we have never seen each other, we became fast friends through correspondence. Together we started the Polio Club,—for girls, like ourselves, who had had poliomyelitis. That was in June. Now the club has nine members: the youngest being thirteen, the oldest a married lady. The idea of the club is to write circular letters and make them as cheerful and interesting as possible. Lately we have been trying literary stunts, like writing rhymes, etc. It certainly makes one happy to see a big letter, with a nine-cent stamp on it, coming in the mail.

Most of us belong to the "wheel-chair brigade," and cannot walk very much yet. But we firmly expect to some day! We keep busy, and therefore do not find it so very hard to keep cheerful: except sometimes. We have done lots of Red Cross work. If you know of any "polio" girls, Miss Connolly, won't you put them in touch with us, please?

MISS ALICE R. THRALL.

I would suggest to Mrs. N. H. W. that she interest one or two others in the boys' and girls' need of a Sunday school, and that they organize one at once. They must not mind the opposition. Every good cause is opposed. If they will work on, before very long the results will be seen and the whole community will get interested. LEONARD J. PRIESTLY.

I certainly appreciate the letters from my neighbors! I shall write to them, in the near future, through the Neighbor's Forum. I have been thinking over this whole situation, day and night almost, and have made a small beginning by calling on sick neighbors. Through these, I shall get to know everyone. MRS. N. H. W.

I am glad you contemplate admitting us men. We stand in need of gleaming some adventures in neighboring besides those obtained at the "corner store." The Men's Brotherhood described recently would exert a great influence on the social, intellectual and moral development of any community. MR. O. E. ULNESS.

In the Christian Herald of January 16, I saw a letter from Mrs. N. H. W. which aroused all my sympathies. Should work or play bring those boys within call, one of these cold days, this neighbor might invite them in to warm up at the kitchen fire: thus warming hearts as well as fingers. Then she might call on the neighbors, with knitting or darning, telling them of her need for neighbors. After this she could visit the school teacher and offer a small sum as prize for a paper on some patriotic subject. These papers, by the pupils, should be judged, and the best ones read at an evening gathering. All decorations and other matters connected with this evening party should be seen to by the boys. I think Mrs. N. H. W. would find that this would create a new community feeling. MRS. EMILY OSARD.

Whether You Are Buyer or Seller

There is a definite message for you in this picture, whether you are at the present moment interested in used cars or not.

It involves something which is equally important

- to the man who wishes to sell a used car
- to the man who wishes to buy a used car
- to the man who intends to buy a new car
- to the man who has new cars to sell.

For every new car becomes in time a used car.

And when that time comes you may wish to sell it, and you hope someone else will want to buy it.

What it returns to its former owner; what it gives to its new owner, depends to a very great extent on the sturdiness originally built into its vital working parts.

If it has Timken Bearings it should bring a higher price to you, and should represent better value to the purchaser. There are many reasons why this is so. Consider a few of them:

Timken Bearings mean less cost for repairs and replacements—therefore a smaller total outlay for the service the car has already given. Thus the selling price represents a higher percentage of that outlay that is returned to the original owner.

Further, the new owner can also anticipate the same results; for the bearings will keep right on giving efficient service as long as the car lasts.

Again, with Timken Bearings transmission and rear axle gears can be kept in correct adjustment, so that the buyer is more apt to find them in good condition.

The careful way in which Timken Bearings are engineered into every car is additional assurance that both they and the parts they support will stand up to their work as long as the car holds together.

What is more, the presence of Timken

Bearings in a motor car implies sound construction elsewhere; for Timken quality costs more, and the car builder who pays for it is usually one who believes that good quality in all fundamental parts should rank above price considerations. He naturally does not apply that principle to bearings only.

So, whether you are buyer or seller, whether interested in a used car or a new one, give thought to this matter of bearing quality.

You will find helpful information in the book, G-3, entitled "How Can I Tell?" explaining the difference between various types of motor-car bearings, and why Timken Bearings have had such a remarkable record of performance at the points of severest service—transmission, wheels, differential and pinion or worm—in passenger cars, motor trucks, tractors and trailers.

Jesus Ministering to the Multitude

International Sunday School Lesson for March 24

Mark 6:32-56

The Challenge of Human Need

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

PHILANTHROPY may be claimed as a distinctively Christian virtue, for the love of man as man, the compassion upon men in the mass apart from their graces or their deserts, is very largely a heritage from the spirit of Jesus Christ. Paganism used to regard men in numbers with contemptuous indifference. A characteristic phrase is the Greek "hoi polloi," the many, with its inevitable touch of scorn. The Pharisees called them "the people of the land" or "they that know not the law" and regarded these common people as accursed. The noble Roman looked with scorn upon the "proletarians," people who have many children, as un-Christian exploiters of the poor have looked upon them ever since.

All these viewed the throng with curled lip as if to sneer, "Silly sheep." Christ, on the contrary, saw all the helplessness and folly, yet yearned over the multitude with a shepherd heart of love. And Christ's attitude has come to prevail in all his true followers. I recall a time when I threw on the screen a picture of a vast crowd of Hindus assembled at the Ganges for an idolatrous ceremony. I did not have to appeal for Christian sympathy and help for their obvious need, for I could see on the faces of my audience the compassion of Christ. Not long ago, a man was bitterly denouncing our German enemies. A friend exhibited to him a picture of a group of them taken prisoners, in rags and wounds, haggard and worn, being ministered to by French captors. Instantly his countenance changed. "Poor boys!" was all he said.

Our First Reaction—What Can We Do?

The woes of the world are too much for us. When we first confront a starving multitude, we have the same helpless feeling that the twelve apostles experienced. What can we do? Are we not in worse case than the twelve on the shores of Galilee long ago? For we look out upon nations, millions, in hunger and want. Many sincere Christians are trying to dismiss Armenia and Belgium and Poland from their minds because they feel they cannot help. A good deacon recently said to his pastor, "Why do you bring in the sufferings of Armenia so often? It interferes with the quiet, helpful atmosphere of our worship." Just as in the sixth chapter of Mark, when they said to Jesus, "Send them away and let us continue the conference we planned to have together."

This same sense of inadequacy to the task moved a loyal churchman to say, "The war appeals are so many and insistent. We must give up our program of world missions. We can't do everything." Yes, the task is gigantic—a billion souls outside the knowledge of the Christ! But dare we withdraw our teachers, our medical missionaries and our evangelists, while men are hungering for the Bread of Life?

Jesus' Calm Insistence—"Give Ye Them to Eat"

Just as in those days gone by, so now the spirit of Christ will not let us dismiss the multitude from our minds and hearts. "Give ye them to eat," he says, and lays upon our souls a responsibility that we cannot escape if we would. Some one must care. Some one must help. Some one must make the attempt in faith. Because it is just as true now as then that when some one cares, truly cares, then the problem begins to yield its solution.

When the burden of India got upon the souls of the Careys and the Judsons, then the satisfaction of India's age-long spiritual thirst was begun. When the intolerable conditions in the slums got upon the soul of Jacob Riis and his fellow workers, then the tenement problem in New York began to be solved. When Thomas Mott Osborne felt that he absolutely must do something for the prisoners in Sing Sing, then a new era in American penology was at hand.

Consider for a moment the awful, world-old misery of human slavery. From the dawn of history until yesterday, untold millions had groaned in bondage. So great a man as Edmund Burke said that it always had been and doubtless always would be, and endeavored to dismiss it from his mind. But Wilberforce in England and Garrison in America felt that Christ had commanded them insistently to free the slaves, to the last bondsman. They dared to face such giant wrong, at first almost alone, and finally they accomplished the impossible.

Today men still repeat that there have always been wars and always must be. But still the Prince of Peace is holding before his Church the ideals of human fellowship and good will, and consecrated apostles are laboring to make this present war the last great international conflict.

His Requirement—The Consecration of What We Have

Because they had not two hundred shillings' worth of bread they were going to do nothing. They might at least have offered the five barley loaves they had. The little lad who gave these so willingly evinced the right spirit. He was "doing his bit." More than that, he was doing his best. I am afraid of this notion of doing one's bit. Our people are interpreting it to mean giving dolles here and there, buying a bond and subscribing a dollar, and giving five cents to missions each week. In England the expression originated among men who gave all they had and all that they were, and then modestly realized that it was only a "bit" in the face of the awful need. We cannot win this war nor can we evangelize the world and bring in the kingdom by petty services rendered in a petty spirit. We must consecrate what we have—all of it—even though we think it insignificant compared with the need.

We have too many who because they cannot do great things are leaving undone the share they could accomplish. Too many "would give a hospital or an ambulance if I could," and are not buying all the thrift stamps they might. Too many "would adopt a Belgian family if I were able," but are not saving five loaves by wise economy in the kitchen. Indeed there are doubtless among our young people in our Sunday schools David Livingstones and Alexander Mackays who will never go forth, because "there is so little I can do." Hold up before them the example of Mackay, who said, "I am an engineer, and I propose, if the Lord will, to go as an engineering missionary. I know the plan is entirely new and will be difficult to work. I hope especially to connect Christianity with modern civilization." Read of his marvelous success in Uganda, which happened to need engineering and Christian character.

Under God We Have More Than We Think

It may be confidently stated that we always have more than we think. Certainly, when Christ takes in hand our gifts they become divinely adequate to situations we never dreamed of meeting. You would never expect the Fourth Gospel, with its key-text "God is love," from the stormy youth who wished to call down fire from heaven on the Samaritans. You could scarcely look for the ministry of our glorious Y. M. C. A. organization from George Williams's efforts to gather his fellow dry-goods clerks into Bible study groups back in 1844. Those who have given to the Red Cross ought to know that it is the direct result of the labors of a man who felt that he must do what he could to alleviate the sufferings of the wounded in wartime.

Yes, we can do more than we think. It is not our duty to estimate how much, but do what we can. God takes care of the increasing. We can do more than we think because we have more than we think. Five years ago, it would have been hard to convince the average American family that they could afford to own bonds. Now, with higher prices for everything needful, nearly every family owns bonds and is about to buy more. We thought we could not give to works of mercy but by pennies. Now we are giving in dollars and in hundreds of dollars for the various emergency funds. What a tremendous impetus the work of Christ would receive if the same spirit were to spread through the Church with regard to missionary gifts!

Conservation—The Sin of Waste

Conscious of infinite resources, Christ was a teacher of thrift. He lived in a land where waste, as we know it, was almost unheard of. The campaign for food conservation is part of a new era in American life. We are learning that we are rich members of a great world family and that our brothers and sisters are on short rations. Could any Christian waste while his brethren suffer? The war is teaching us what Paul tried to teach the early Church, "None of us liveth to himself." The Sunday school class is a good place to cooperate with Mr. Hoover, for, after all, the appeal is chiefly based on a Christian regard for the needs of a suffering world.

By all means assign different boys and girls to bring in reports on great Christian philanthropies, finding the names of those who have done great things for orphans (as Barnardo), for the freed people (as Armstrong), the unfortunate (as Booth), and the imprisoned (as Howard). Read up on some of these and tell their story, as of Howard the wealthy landlord, who out of Christian pity took up the duties of a prison warden and spent his life in bettering conditions, dying of prison fever at last. Compare the recent efforts of Thomas Mott Osborne in our country. Ask in each case if there is anything we can do.

Today Christian philanthropy confronts a more vital task than ever, which is embodied in the cry, "Not charity, but justice." It is not enough to alleviate poverty, but we must seek to abolish it. Not enough to better the prisons, but to keep boys from becoming criminals. Not enough to save a few souls, but we must create a Christian community that will produce innumerable genuine children of God.

What are we doing in the face of human need today? Christ is saying to his Church once more, "Give ye unto them."

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Apply the Spiritual Truth of the Lesson

SEVERAL hundred teachers have been called into council to answer this question for Christian Herald readers out of their experience. The method of applying the lesson's spiritual truth necessarily differs with different ages. The answers here given apply above the Primary Department.

A teacher of male adults (aged nineteen to twenty-three) says: "I aim to let them deduce spiritual lessons from the situations, and I then enlarge upon them. Young men at this age are concerned with individual and social problems."

A teacher of young men, seventeen to nineteen: "I try to prove that these spiritual truths and powers are dynamic forces open to the control of individuals."

A teacher of a mixed class (nineteen to twenty-four): "I try to know their needs and problems and make my applications fit. If it goes home to present wants the method doesn't matter."

A teacher of sixteen-year-old girls: "I try to make the application so simple and beautiful that every girl wishes to go home and practice it during the week. They report their success the following Sunday. I find this plan most interesting."

A teacher of boys (ages twelve and thirteen): "I generally apply by telling a story, illustrating the concrete application."

A teacher of girls of same age: "I vary the application as much as possible. When I find they are intensely interested I drive the truth home by Scripture verse or illustration."

A teacher of seventeen-year-old girls: "I ask these questions: 'What personal duty is there in the lesson for us? How can we this week make this practical? Have we done anything of the last lesson's teaching that has developed us?'"

A teacher of young men, sixteen to twenty: "I give my boys home work on the subject that will make them think. In the lesson teaching I am keeping in mind the need of each boy's life."

A teacher of young ladies: "I used to wait until the close of the lesson; but now, all through the lesson, I try to bring Christ in, and find it a much better way, and have more attention paid."

A teacher of fifteen-year-old girls: "The girls are a great help here. I have succeeded in getting them to ask 'Why?' when assertions are made. Then I usually get various ones to answer the 'why.' I watch the spiritual life grow in these answers and then answer as I see it. Then we compare answers and see why some answers lack spiritual insight. Most of my girls are very frank in their answers though often mistaken."

Other methods suggested are: "Sentence prayers from everybody once a month." "A verse of Scripture they think appropriate to subject." "I get the class to tell me the lessons and how to apply to present-day life." "I give them a question and let them think out and apply it themselves." "I never preach. If they cannot get the truth from the lesson without tacking on a moral they don't get it at all."

Replies from teachers of beginners' classes (three to five): "I try to make the lesson personal by asking children's opinion of the wrong way and the right way." "After bringing out the lesson truth I have a song ready bearing upon it." "I tell the story and let the child apply it."

From primary class teachers: "I refer back to Golden Text and apply it by a story or application." "If they haven't absorbed the spiritual truth by the time I have finished the lesson story without my 'rubbing it in' I have failed in that lesson."

Mount Hermon Boys in the War

MOUNT HERMON SCHOOL for boys, founded by the late Evangelist D. L. Moody occupies a unique place among educational institutions. Its boys are self supporting, or at least very extensively self assisting, and have come right out of the very heart of American democracy. Very low tuition charges, manual work—especially agricultural—a religious atmosphere, liberal but definite, and a course in the English Bible, make a combination not exactly duplicated. The boys have shown the patriotic spirit of the founder, for D. L. Moody was ever a Christian soldier and his work in the Christian Commission during the Civil War is still widely remembered. His son Paul is in France as a chaplain with the American forces and the Mount Hermon students are to be found "doing their bit" in the home camps, on the sea, in the trenches and on the battle line. Several have been "killed in battle." The school list contains the names of five hundred boys who are known to be in the service. Principal Cutler served on the C. R. B. for six months in Belgium and half a dozen other members of the faculty are now engaged in actual army work or in the work of the Y. M. C. A. One old student is a colonel in the Canadian army; while in the American army one student is a colonel and four have the rank of major. There are numerous chaplains, captains and lieutenants. One of the majors is in charge of all the railroad arrangements connected with the over-seas transportation of troops, and another Hermon man is directing the religious work of the red triangle throughout the entire Eastern Department.

All this has deeply affected the school. First, the fundamental principles—the D. L. Moody constitution, so to speak—Bible Study, dignity of work, religious training, a chance for the handicapped, education for service, have received a new baptism, as it were, and are emphasized and appreciated in a new and living way. Second, the older boys and young men who have hitherto made up the school constituency are no longer available as students. They are going, going, gone! And so the school has had to face a serious question and decide whether to suspend operations entirely during the period of the war or to change the minimum age limit and admit younger boys. Naturally the latter alternative has been adopted, and the younger boys are coming, many parents and guardians gladly availing themselves of the unusual opportunity.

DETROIT VAPOR STOVES

"Work Like Gas"

Burn Oil, Gasoline or Distillate

THEY are just like gas stoves in looks and sturdy construction. Their quick, thorough cooking and baking is fully equal to gas but the expense is less than with either gas, coal or wood.

There are no wicks or wick substitutes, just durable 8½ lb. iron burners that vaporize all the oil so that they really burn a gas instead of a liquid, giving an intensely hot blue flame that can be regulated to any requirement.

The kettles go on as soon as the match is struck. The double walled ovens distribute the heat and use it twice.

Each stove is complete in itself, fuel supply and all. It can be placed for greatest convenience and step saving. No piping or pressure tank.

Some good dealer in your town sells Detroit Vapor Stoves. Go to his store and see what the picture cannot tell about this guaranteed, high quality stove. Also write us for free Stove Book C2, showing latest styles and sizes selling for $20 and up, meeting every requirement for large and small households, cottage, suburban home, camp and farm. BOSS Glass Door OVEN

Spoiled Food Is a National Waste—Help Stop It

Every year thousands of dollars are thrown away through spoiling food, either by mistakes or on account of wrong kitchen equipment. Much of it is spoiled in old-fashioned ovens.

Baking with an iron-door oven is mostly guesswork. You're never sure. If you open the door to look, a little cool air gets in and your cake drops flat or the pastry comes out soggy. If you don't look like as not they'll burn.

With a Boss Glass Door Oven you look through the oven door. Any minute, you can tell at a glance exactly how fast the biscuits are baking and when to take them out. And they won't be done too much on one side and not enough on the other. The patented deflector in all Boss Ovens distributes the heat evenly.

Your Boss will last a lifetime. You can use it on any oil, gas or gasoline stove, and the patriotic thing to do now is to use an oil or gas stove to help conserve the Nation's supply of coal. Buy a Boss and watch it bake.

Remember, all glass door ovens are not Boss Ovens. The glass on the Boss Oven is guaranteed to remain unaffected by heat. Buy it by name and then, and then only are you certain of getting the genuine.

We shall be glad to send you our interesting booklet and the name of the Boss Dealer nearest you.

The Gospel Need in Russia

By PASTOR WILLIAM FETLER

President of the Russian Bible and Educational Institute, Philadelphia

I AM a native of Russia, of the Province of Courland, and a Lett by birth. From my earliest memories I have been inclined for missionary and self-sacrificial work. Probably that was partly due to my father having been one of the early Russian Christian preachers of the Free Evangelical type. Some of my early recollections as a boy go back to having seen my father while fulfilling his duties as a Gospel preacher attacked by a mob with stones, the windows of our Gospel hall broken in, and revolver shots heard in the streets. At the age of nineteen I went to England, where I spent several years in preparing, as I thought at that time, for missionary work in China. As the time of my graduation came near, Russia, however, was partially opened to a free evangelistic work, Czar Nicholas II having published a manifesto of religious liberty. Returning there in the year 1907, I was enabled to establish large missionary centers in Petrograd, Moscow and Riga.

The work grew very rapidly. I started in the city of Petrograd, at that time still called St. Petersburg, with a mission hall holding about four hundred people; then another hall, still another; we rented two theaters, two concert halls and over half a dozen other mission halls in various parts of the city; the rent for all of the halls on an average being about eight hundred rubles a month. The need for a large central building was seen, so we started to collect funds from our converts for a large tabernacle, which was subsequently built to hold about two thousand people, and was completed at an expense of $125,000 in American money.

THE Russian converts from the Greek Church were very zealous in helping with this work; they not only gave all they could out of their earnings, very often from thirty to fifty per cent. of all their money, but they brought of their gold and silver ornaments, such as rings, bracelets, earrings, gold and silver crosses, silver tea- and table-spoons, and other things of that sort, so that when I went for a lecture tour to England to raise more funds, I took a basketful of these goods to be sold there for that purpose. The widow of a Russian painter, Yasnofsky, who had been a professor of art in a Moscow institute, presented for the same purpose a dozen fine paintings by her husband. The self-sacrifice of the Russian converts seemed unparalleled considering their previous spiritual condition. This was very remarkable. Hundreds had been habitual drunkards. The religion to which they formerly belonged, namely, the Greek Orthodox State Church, of which the Czar was the head, thought little of developing the religious and moral forces of the people, but to keep them ignorant seemed to be made especially propitious for the church. If the Russian pilgrims as they made their way in tens of thousands toward the Greek Church monasteries and sanctuaries brought enough money to the monks, that was about all that was expected of them. The illiteracy of the people throughout Russia has been due very largely to the inattention of the Greek Church clergy in matters of education. Immorality has been awful and spread wholesale.

You could then understand such people coming by hundreds to our Gospel meetings, and on hearing of some better life they would cry out, even before my sermon was finished: "Pray for me! I have been a drunkard for twenty-five years; I am perishing!" A woman would get up, confessing her sins; a man would get on his knees right in front of all, confessing almost every imaginable sin—theft, drunkenness, adultery, murder, and what not. Hundreds of them have been reclaimed. Sometimes people of education would rush to the repentance seat at the pulpit. I remember once a Russian count, a descendant of one of the heroes of the Russian Napoleonic War, kneeling amid dozens of others and asking to be led in the paths of righteousness.

THE first few years after my return from England I had considerable liberty while Stolypin was the Prime Minister and Harousin Minister of Foreign Religions. I was given the privilege by the Minister of the Interior to travel throughout the country and hold meetings. However, the priests raised considerable persecution during my work in Moscow. Then Stolypin was assassinated at the hands of a revolutionary. The Church of the Holy Synod came to their power again, making the ministers of state simple tools in their hands. My Sunday schools were closed; limitation after limitation was invented, and numerous spies began to visit our meetings.

At first the Russian government tried to persuade me to enter the ranks of the Greek Church, offering me the position of bishop and then archbishop. I preferred to remain a persecuted sectarian with an unbribed conscience, rather than enjoy the glory of such a position and become a dead preacher. I found, however, that nothing stifles the tongue of truth so much as gold. The situation grew worse and worse. For five years a court procedure was carried against me in Moscow, until the autumn the war broke out, when I was sentenced to six months' imprisonment in a fortress because of my activities in Moscow. Not being satisfied with that, the Greek Church dignitaries incited the government to take further measures. At one of my meetings in Petrograd a police officer came presenting an ultimatum that I should not allow anybody else to preach in my pulpit save myself, and that I should not visit any other churches or cities but my own. I refused. Next day I went to see the Prime Minister, His Excellency Goremykin. That was in the year 1914, two months after the war started. The Prime Minister's wife had been in my meetings, yet, not unlike the wife of Pilate, she could not influence her husband from taking severe measures against the hated Stundist or sectarian. I asked him to revoke the severe order against our Gospel work; if not, I said, "We cannot obey the Czar more than God and Christ, who is the Czar of all czars." "Put us in prison, send us to Siberia, cut us in pieces," I was forced to declare, "but we will speak the truth and the Gospel of liberty so long as our tongues move within our mouths."

Shortly afterward, at a Saturday night prayer meeting in my church in Petrograd, while we were engaged in singing, I was called out by one of my deacons; a police force was waiting outside. The police inspector presented an order by the military governor that I must be immediately arrested, put in prison and sent to Siberia. No explanation or reason was given. Not an hour was given me to settle my business. I was forbidden to go downstairs to say good-by to my church. As a murderer or some other awful criminal I was marched, with my crying wife by my side, along the streets to the prison gate, where I was put in a small cell behind two iron-barred doors, with several other criminals. No extra bed was found for me, so I was told to sleep on the same bed with another prisoner. I did not know what was to come; perhaps a cold Siberian grave was awaiting me. Later I was let out of the prison with permission to go to Siberia at my own expense. Three days later I was allowed to go to America instead.

SINCE the revolution what a remarkable change has taken place! One of my friends has written me that the very prison in which I was put has been razed to the ground by the revolutionary forces, and the chief police inspector under whose power I was arrested has been killed.

I arrived in this country, in the city of New York, in the early part of May, 1915. My chief reason for coming to America was a vision which I had conceived for 2,000,000 Russian war prisoners in Germany and Austria. Prevent from preaching in Russia, I saw an opportunity of reaching them in their misfortune. So I formed a committee in New York to which a number of the foremost religious leaders in this country gave their support and influence. Among them were Dr. J. H. Jowett, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City; Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly; the editor of the Christian Herald; Dr. W. E. Haven, secretary of the American Bible Society, and many others. As a result of that work millions of copies of tracts and Scripture portions have been spread among the war prisoners. The influence has been great, as our reports tell us, and the chief thing is that when they go back to Russia after the war they will be, each one of them, a reformer and preacher of the simple evangelical Gospel and a transforming power among their countrymen in thousands upon thousands of centers.

Three months before the Revolution I was led to associate myself with some American friends to establish a Russian missionary and educational school in the city of New York. Six months later I transferred my headquarters to the city of Philadelphia. I came to Philadelphia without a cent of money for that work. The blessing of God has been great. I have now more than a hundred students in the school, who have come from all parts of the United States and Canada. Most of them have been former drunkards and men of immoral life. Few of them have had even five or six months' learning before in Russia; not one of them could read or write his own language. In our curriculum one of the basic things we have introduced is the English language. I want each one of my students to become proficient as far as possible in that. I want my students, when they go back to Russia, to become leaders among their own people, and to be able to remain in contact with the English-speaking world. I want them to receive American Christian papers. We shall endeavor to supply each one of them with a small English library before they go back to Russia.

WE are teaching all of the elementary subjects in our school—history, geography, mathematics, some sciences, and much time we devote to music. I am specially desirous of having them play on some brass musical instrument, because for the first time in the history of Russia we can have open-air services.

I am convinced that these students of the Russian Bible and Educational Institute will be the best and most lasting link of friendship between the New Russia and the United States, these two largest commonwealths of the world. But thus far we have been able to touch only the fringe of the Russian colony in the States and in Canada. There are hundreds of thousands yet to be reached.

I started practically alone. On the property which cost us $45,000 I have been able thus far to pay only $5,000. Our accommodations have already become too small, and I should like to receive at least two or three hundred more students before many months. I do not believe in the parasite system of educating foreigners in this country. I believe they must be taught to do all they can for themselves. Thus my students during the first six months of the existence of the school have paid more than $7,000 toward their food and rooms. With sufficient help I want to enlarge the work and influence hundreds of Russians before they go back to Russia. Each one of such men reached now will mean a better feeling in Russia for the American people.

A Call to Church Unity in War Time

TO our Fellow-Believers in all the Churches, Greeting:

The present crisis confronts the Church with the possibility of coming forth from the war either with a diminished or a vaster power. Today the churches must face realities. A divided Church cannot stand.

Today everywhere the people are combining their industries to make the Allied nations one mighty power in the war. Even on the lower plane of economics, the churches are not uniting to save waste as in many places they might do. How many tons of coal and units of electricity might be saved if thin congregations in large edifices should consent this winter to worship together!

Far more than this: today the Young Men's Christian Association represents Christianity before the world. The many churches stand as an unorganized, scattered line of support behind its well-organized line of volunteers. As they go forward the separate church-units are not in position to let the world know that behind them stands the reserve power of the whole Church of God. Today some of our ministers at the front, forgetting the denominational names of the churches that sent them, on battle-fields and in hospitals are working side by side as servants and priests of God. At home they are held apart. Today the government of the United States is apportioning chaplains among the different denominations. The Red Cross only for our charity; our denominational names and churchly vestments for our religion!

These things ought not so to be. The crisis of Christianity requires the subordination of all things divisive. Without prejudice to existing personal relations or official fidelities, the whole Church is called today to make one sacrificial offering of all things held to be of value in one great venture of faith for God. Today we should take counsel, not of our fears but of our hopes, as did our fathers before us. Today our fears may be our disloyalties.

Bishops, clergymen, laymen: shall we loiter in the way, disputing about many things, when in the suffering of the world our Lord is crucified afresh for the sin of modern civilization? The hour commands unity. By some decisive act our faith in it should be made fact. That might be done if, for example, as a war measure we should put in cantonments, in regiments and on battleships chaplains and ministers, from whatever church they may come, commissioned not by their own communion only, but by joint ordination or consecration sent forth with whatsoever authority and grace the whole Church of God may confer, bearing no mark upon them but the sign of the Cross. At some single point of vital contact—that or something better than that—the Church might act as one.

Something must be made the visible fact of unity today, if the Church is to become tomorrow the power of God to save the world. This cannot be too long postponed. These times require quick decisions.

Therefore we, the undersigned, representing different communions, lay before you this appeal for action, asking for response and for such suggestions as may seem to you timely.

The foregoing appeal is signed by a very large number of clergymen, representing all the leading denominations, including Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples, Moravians, Lutherans, Friends, and evangelical bodies. There are among the signers the presidents of theological seminaries, Yale, Union, Princeton, Andover, Pacific, Chicago, Boston Divinity School, Rochester, Dartmouth, Auburn, Carleton, Whitman College, Beloit College and others; also the present moderator of the Congregational National Council, and several former moderators. The chairman of the committee is Rev. Newman Smyth of New Haven. Some of the leading signers are Dean Charles R. Brown of Yale; President McGiffert of Union; President J. Ross Stevenson of Princeton; Rev. Washington Gladden, Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, and President MacCracken of Vassar.

These Plants Thrive With Red Snapper Plant Food

Are your plants, vines, and shrubbery doing well? Have you had success with your flowers or do they look sickly and thriftless? Do you realize that "scraggly" plants are worse than no plants at all? The difference between weak, thriftless, off-colored plants, and healthy, luxuriant, rich colored flowers and foliage, is the difference between success and failure. If your plants are not doing well, chances are they need food. They are being starved and are an eyesore and a source of annoyance rather than pleasure, but don't throw them away, use

Success with Flowers

Red Snapper Plant Food

RED SNAPPER PLANT FOOD is a wonderfully rich, very nutritious, yet harmless fertilizer for plants of this kind. Its effect can be noticed within a few days after the first application. Color of foliage recovers a darker green and flower and blossoms take on a beauty of coloring and size beyond all expectation. The wonder and elimination of all who use them. It is made from the head bones and nitrogenous cartilage of the South American Red Snapper fish, dried under intense heat, mixed with other organic plant foods to make a perfectly balanced ration, then ground and bottled in four mill machines into a fine meal. It is thoroughly sterilized, clean and sanitary, to be used in the finest homes and conservatories as well as for outside use. Put up in 2 lb. cans including an 8 oz. package of RED SNAPPER Plant Food which is used to give the plants quick start. Price 50c. Also put up in 12 1/2 lb. buran paper lined racks. Price $1.50. For sale by all leading Florists, Druggists, Grocers and Nurseries. Ask your dealers. If they have not got it, send us their names and we will see that they get it for you. For your trouble we will send postage prepaid, our valuable booklet "HOUSE PLANTS AND FLOWER GARDENS—Their Care and Culture," which contains fourteen chapters of general information. This is worth 50c alone to any lover of flowers.

What Armenia Has Suffered

By Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU, Former Ambassador to Turkey

FEW nations have suffered as much as Armenia. So terrible and continuous have been the atrocities to which it has fallen victim that the very name of Armenia has, to most of us, become synonymous with martyrdom. Its sufferings during the present catastrophe have been greater than any known in the history of the world. None of the fearful horrors perpetrated in the various zones of the war can compare with the tragic lot of the Armenians.

The final and worst measure used against the Armenians was the wholesale deportation of the entire population from their homes and their exile to the desert, with all the accompanying horrors of the way. No means were provided for their transportation or nourishment. The victims, among whom were included educated men and women of standing, had to walk on foot, exposed to the attacks of bands of criminals especially organized for that purpose. Homes were literally uprooted; families were captured; men killed, women and girls violated daily on the way or taken to harems. Children were thrown into the rivers or sold to strangers by their mothers to save them from starvation. The facts contained in the reports received at the embassy from absolutely trustworthy eye-witnesses surpass the most beastly and diabolical cruelties ever before perpetrated or imagined in the history of the world.

THE Turkish authorities had stopped all communication between the provinces and the capital in the naïve belief that they could consummate this crime of the ages before the outside world could hear of it. But the information filtered through the consuls, missionaries, foreign travelers, and even Turks. We soon learned that orders had been issued to the governors of the provinces to send into exile the entire Armenian population in their jurisdiction, irrespective of age or sex. The local officers, with a few exceptions, carried out literally these instructions. All the able-bodied men had either been drafted into the army or disarmed. The remaining people, old men, women, and children, were subjected to the most cruel and outrageous treatment.

In Mamuret-ul-Aziz the people were subjected for two months to almost unbelievable torture, the families of the better class being dealt with most severely. Feet, hands, chests were nailed to a piece of wood; nails of fingers and toes were torn; beards and eyebrows pulled out; feet were hammered with nails, as they do with horses; others were hung with their feet up and heads down over closets. Oh, how one would wish that all these facts were not true! In order that people outside might not hear the screams of agony of the poor victims, men stood around the prison wherein these atrocities were committed, with drums and whistles.

On July 1, the first 2,000 were dispatched from Harpoot. They were soldiers, and it was rumored that they would build roads. People became frightened. Whereupon the vali called the German missionary, Mr. —, and begged him to quiet the people; he was so very sorry that they all had such fears, etc. They had hardly been away for a day, when they were all killed in a mountain pass. They were bound together, and when the Kurds and soldiers started to shoot at them, some managed to escape in the dark. The next day 2,000 more were sent in the direction of Diarbekir. Among those deported were several of our orphans (boys) who had been working for the government all the year round. Even the wives of the Kurds came with their knives and murdered the Armenians. Some of the latter succeeded in fleeing. When the government heard that some Armenians managed to escape, they left those who were to be deported without food for two days, in order that they would be too weak to flee.

ALL the high Catholic Armenians, together with their archbishop, were murdered. Up to now there still remained a number of tradesmen whom the government needed and therefore had not deported; now these too were ordered to leave and were murdered.

As this massacre of the Armenians, judged both by the numbers involved and the methods used, was the greatest single horror ever perpetrated in the history of humanity, the question will often be asked, How many Armenians were actually murdered or died of starvation or exposure? How many were driven into a miserable exile? Following the important collection of documents made by Viscount Bryce is a careful summary of the facts. The total Armenian population in the Turkish empire in 1912 is here placed at between 1,600,000 and 2,000,000. Of these 182,000 escaped into the Russian Caucasus and 4,200 into Egypt. One hundred and fifty thousand still remain in Constantinople. To this figure must be added the relatively small number of survivors who escaped death, and are now living in hiding or are scattered in distant provinces. We must conclude that a million Armenians were hurried out of their homes in the peaceful villages and populous towns in Asia Minor. The murdered number from 600,000 to 800,000. The remainder, in pitiful want of the bare necessities of life, hold out their hands to the Christian fellowship of America.

RUG ECONOMY

in attractive patterns

IT is a duty you owe to yourself and to your country to economize in every possible way during these war times. You are "doing your bit" when you buy CREX Grass Rugs for your floors. It's the patriotic, as well as the practical, thing to do.

Every wool or cotton rug or carpet now made takes away material from much-needed war work. CREX Rugs are made from long pliant wire-grass not adaptable for use in any other purpose. Moreover, a less number of processes are required in the making of CREX—consequently less labor and less fuel are absorbed, thus further meeting the administration's requirements.

CREX Rugs will give you satisfaction not only in their practical economy, but in their attractiveness, durability, comfort. The wide range of beautiful designs and tasteful colorings makes it easy to select exactly the right rug for every room in your house—for use the year-round.

Questions and Answers

READER. Is there any hope for a person who is the slave of a particular sin, into which he falls every time he is tempted, in spite of his resolutions and his prayers?

Yes, there is hope, if he honestly desires to be delivered. If the thing were distasteful to him, he would not do it; so that what he has to do is to overcome his own desire and God will assuredly help him to do this, if he will ask His help. But He will not help a man who does not want to be helped. The man should carefully avoid temptation and the circumstances in which it assails him. He can assure himself that, with God's help, he can resist, and he should pray earnestly for the necessary strength. God will give it.

Subscriber, Pittsburg, Pa. The word "paradise" is one of wide application. It has been used in various terrestrial senses and also in the celestial sense. Its figurative application to the heavenly world is chiefly used to denote the happiness of the righteous or the pardoned in the future state. Among the Jews themselves, the Talmudical writings contain frequent reference to paradise as "the immortal heaven" to which the spirits of the just are admitted immediately after their liberation from the body. Thus the book Sohar speaks of the earthly and the heavenly paradise, the latter excelling the former as light excels darkness. It was in the acceptance of the ancient Jewish phraseology of New Testament times that the expression was used both by our Lord and his apostles. "Today thou shalt be with me in paradise." "He was caught up into paradise." "The tree of life is in the paradise of God." (Luke 23:43; 11 Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7.)

Reader, Norwalk, Conn. There seems to be an impression in certain quarters that the Y. M. C. A. in the army camps does not permit the celebration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in the huts it has erected for the soldiers. We are assured that the fact of the matter is quite the reverse. All the Association secretaries at work in camps and cantonments are instructed to facilitate in every way the desire of any Christian clergyman, chaplain or civilian, to conduct sacramental services in any Y. M. C. A. building which best serves the convenience of himself and the prospective communicants. The Association's staff men attached to the buildings do not themselves conduct the administration of the sacrament, that duty being the prerogative of the chaplains; but they do all they can to facilitate it, as well as every other form of regular pastoral work.

G. E. W., Greenwood, Mass. The interpretation of the passage in Revelation to which you refer is, like many others in that book, a subject of controversy.

H. A. F., Detroit, Mich. In Gen. 5:3-5 we read of the long life of Adam after the Fall. He surely had ample opportunity for repentance, when he viewed the condition to which his act had brought posterity, from a state of complete happiness to one of toil and suffering. God's grace and mercy are boundless, and we may assume that Adam not only repented while living, but that he believed the Gospel which was preached to him (1 Pet. 3:19) and in which God's plan to heal the wounds of sin was made clear to those who had not known the Gospel while living. (Your other questions are mainly controversial.)

P. J. D., Hale, Mo., writes: "When the churches are divided on the question whether a thing is right or wrong, it usually takes from forty to fifty years of preaching against an evil to eliminate it from the community or the nation. In North Missouri, thirty-five or forty years ago, most of the small towns and nearly all of the county seats had saloons, and there was considerable drunkenness, immorality and lawlessness. The churches have been steadily preaching against these evils during these years, and as a result they have been eliminated from the greater part of North Missouri, on the Hannibal Railroad running from Hannibal on the eastern border of Missouri to St. Joseph on the western. I understand that there is only one wet town between Hannibal and St. Joseph. In our own little town of about 1,200 inhabitants, the jail has been without an inmate so long that most of the people have nearly forgotten that they have one."

G. D. D., Hampton, Vt., writes: "Referring to page 1279, bottom of second column, what is there said (in the serial story, 'The Witness') is most timely. After sixty-six years of experience, I have been troubled by the same doubts expressed by Wiltmore, as many more must have been. And Courtland's replies most aptly state the conclusions to which I have been compelled. God bless the author of 'The Witness' for her lucid explanation, the best I have ever seen."

M. L. T. B., Chatham, N. Y. The passages quoted are descriptive of those who live without God and who are like "the beasts that perish." The passage concerning the repentant thief was discussed recently in the Mail-Bag.

Mrs. M. A. Dawes of the Bethesda Mission, Wynnewood, Okla., sends this letter, which gives us a glimpse of Christian pioneering in the West that reminds us of missionary perils and hardships in the old days: "I have just been down to the well for water and had an inspiration to write our old friend the Christian Herald. That well was perhaps as much a gift from God as was John G. Paton's on his lone island. A few months ago, Bethesda Mission for ex-slaves of the Indians was literally blown to pieces by a cyclone. The superintendent, Miss E. Fannie Johnston, lay on her deathbed, but her triumphant faith said, 'We shall build.' One member of the board of trustees wrote asking me to come out from New England and help them reestablish the work. I found such utter destruction, my heart shrank from it, but my reply to the people was 'We cannot haul water three-fourths of a mile as they have been doing. If you will get a well, I will stay.' Now in this particular portion of Oklahoma many have bored for wells without success. It had been tried repeatedly on the mission lot. A professional well-digger came and after two attempts gave it up. Then Trustee S. W. Allon and his nephew came and bored. Later another colored man bored at another place and still another. The fifth trial brought us a well. And now, according to promise, I must stay. The basement of the wrecked building has been cleared of debris and covered with a roof. In this one room we expect, for the present, to live and hold our day and night school and our weekly class for women. The people are to erect a small building with the timber left from the mission. We have not a door nor window left. These people had good crops but were deeply in debt. The crops are often mortgaged, sometimes even before the seed is planted. We want to teach them to manage so as to live comfortably. Above all, we want to be messengers of God to them. We are four miles from town and get mail once in five or six days."

Perhaps some of our readers may care to send a cheering letter to this brave woman worker, who certainly deserves encouragement.

S. B. Z., Memo, Pa. The prophecies that remain to be fulfilled before the millennium include the prophecies of Christ's second coming, of the rise of the Antichrist and of the great tribulation.

H. P. Ford, Norwood, Pa., president of the Ruling Elders' Association of Chester Presbytery, sends this kindly note to the Mail-Bag, which we commend to readers of all denominations: "I am a firm believer in the leavening value of the religious paper. It should be a weekly visitor to every Christian home. It offsets, in large measure, the pernicious influence of literature that all too frequently finds its way into the hands and hearts of young people and children. Religious papers are, as a rule, carefully edited and filled with well-selected and helpful home reading-matter; they also keep their readers well informed on the missionary and other activities of the Church at large, both at home and abroad. A religious paper is almost an absolute necessity to the Christian who would keep himself well informed on the activities of the Church at large, and who would have the members of his household brought up 'in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.'"

For Wheatless Days

The Christian Herald Will Send You Free an Illustrated Booklet with Full Directions for the Use of Cornmeal and Sixty-one Delicious Recipes

THE Food Administration has ruled that our bread shall have not more than 80 per cent. wheat flour. At least 20 per cent. must be some substitute.

The most plentiful substitute for wheat flour in the United States is Cornmeal.

The Food Administration has also made a rule that when we buy a pound of wheat flour, the dealer must at the same time sell us a pound of some wheat flour substitute.

Again, the most frequent substitute in these transactions will be Cornmeal.

Every patriotic American household will cooperate cheerfully with the Food Administration in these necessary regulations. We will all observe wheatless meals and wheatless days as well.

A Pleasure, Not a Hardship

Wheatless meals and wheatless days need not be a hardship. They can be made a source of pleasant variety in the weekly menu. Children will look forward to them, if you prepare the delicious dishes from cornmeal that are described in the official booklet distributed free by the Christian Herald.

This pamphlet is a 30-page encyclopedia of Cornmeal. It describes its origin, composition, varieties, selection and care, uses and cooking. It compares the value of Cornmeal with other cereals. Finally, it gives sixty-one carefully selected, tested recipes for cornmeal dishes—bread, puffs, griddle-cakes, waffles, mush, puddings, cakes, and so forth.

You should send for a copy of this booklet today. It will help you to meet the food problem of the hour—the shortage in wheat flour, which must remain acute as long as the war lasts.

The Cornmeal Book is free. You have only to send your name and address with a 2-cent stamp for return postage to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C., and a copy of the Cornmeal Book will be mailed to you promptly.

The Jar of Musterole on the Bath-Room Shelf

When little Susie had the croup; when Johnny got his feet wet and caught cold; when father sprained his knee; when granny's rheumatism bothered her—that jar of Musterole was right there to give relief.

Musterole is a clean, white ointment made with oil of mustard and other home simples. It penetrates down to where the congestion causes the ache or the cold. And the heat which it generates usually carries off the congestion together with the cold or sprain or rheumatism. Yet its heat is a non-blistering heat. Musterole even feels cool a few moments after you have applied it. And the ease usually comes immediately while you are rubbing on Musterole over the place. Keep your jar of Musterole on the bath-room shelf—handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole. 30c and 60c jars—$2.50 hospital size.

Young People's Topics for March 24

Remedies for Intemperance

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Eph. 5:15-21

THERE are varieties of intemperance. Some are intemperate in thought, some in speech, some in eating, some few in working and many are intemperate in the use of strong drink. All intemperance is sin. For sin there are many remedies but only one cure. One man seeking release from intemperance will try the power of will against the pull of appetite. For a while he may do very well; he may even dare to boast of the victory he has gained, only to go reeling home sooner or later, because he met a friend whose ridicule or insistence, or both, enfeebled that all-conquering will. Another will seek release through new associations only to fall sooner or later through some chance meeting with old associates or localities. Still another will try to work so hard that he will have no time for drink, and others will take various courses of treatment only to come back inevitably, with few exceptions, to the demon in the cup.

The writer heard once of a man who had a daughter he loved more than his life. Night after night she climbed on his knee and begged him not to drink. At last he arranged that the child should go with him to the shop after breakfast and call for him at quitting time at night. For weeks they walked safely by groceries and gin mills, past old cronies who called in vain, until it seemed that appetite was vanquished. But one day the child was sick. The father started home alone. He missed the soft warm hand in his, his heart was heavy, the breath of the bottle swept out to him through open saloon doors and at last his feet wavered and he fell. All these remedies fail. Even restrictive laws fail more or less completely. But there is a cure that never fails, unless the victim fails to take it thoroughly. The blood of Jesus Christ cleanses from all sin. Appetite flees before the shadow of the cross. Power to overcome radiates from the risen Saviour. No matter how strong the grip of rum on the life and heart and mind and will of a man, the saving blood of Christ can sweep it all away and the drunkard may be restored. He needs but to throw himself wholly upon the Saviour, trust him completely and seek to serve him loyally. Many a drunkard has seemed to find release at our altars only to fall again, but such have tried to rely on their own returning strength and have temporarily lost their grip on the hand of God. In the Bowery Mission, and in every other place where sinful men are gathered into the Kingdom through the power of Christ's redemption, the miracle of appetite dethroned is seen month after month, man after man is restored to himself and to the world. Never yet has God failed when the man was willing to walk humbly in the way of salvation—willing to be taught and to be led. Struggles there are, many and severe, but the "Lo, I am with you always" was meant for every miserable sinner, even the rebelling slave of drink. Remedies are useless but the cure is absolute.

The Art of Living with Others

Epworth League Topic. 1 Peter 3:3-16

THIS topic, as the Christian Endeavor topic for March 17, was treated in this column in last week's Christian Herald.

detail. Many parts of the enormous machine are as delicate as those in the watch of the engineer who runs it. The whole is an evolution or building up of many inventions, starting with the discovery of steam as a motive power. It was Richard Trevithick who first applied the steam engine to railway operation. That was when Thomas Jefferson was beginning his administration as President of the United States. A little later George Stephenson made a locomotive with four wheels and a wrought-iron boiler. It was only eight feet in length and thirty-four inches in diameter. Later he built other engines, and among them one or two which were shipped from England to the United States. None was used successfully, however, before about 1830, and it was at that time that Adam Hall built the little locomotive known as the "Best Friend" in New York city. This engine had a tubular boiler and two pairs of wheels coupled together by side rods. It was first put to work on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

At about that same time a miniature locomotive was shown at the Philadelphia museum. It drew two small cars and was run on a circular track made of pine boards covered with hoop iron. This engine was made by Mathias Baldwin, the founder of the locomotive works of which I am writing. He made the museum locomotive go and, two years later, constructed the famous locomotive known as "Old Ironsides," which had a speed of thirty miles an hour, carrying passengers from Philadelphia to Germantown. "Old Ironsides" was a four-wheeled locomotive modeled after those of England that had been brought to this country. Its wheels had wooden spokes and rims, heavy wrought iron tires and cast iron hubs. The price Mathias Baldwin received for it, after considerable litigation was just $3,500, or not more than one-twentieth of what some of the big engines of these works would sell for today. Mr. Baldwin was disgusted with the trouble he had over the settlement and he vowed that he would never build another locomotive. Nevertheless, two years later he had completed one for Charleston, S. C., and he continued to build locomotives for the rest of his life. The story of the works is wrapped up in the evolution of railway transportation. Better and better locomotives were made from year to year and more and more were turned out. During our Civil War steel tires were first employed on some engines made for Dom Pedro of Brazil, and in 1890 the first rack rail locomotive was made for Pike's Peak. In the same year three Mogul narrow gauge engines were constructed for the Jaffa-Jerusalem railway and the following year similar steam engines were constructed for Africa. In 1895 the first electric locomotives were built and in 1902 fuel oil burners were made for the Southern Pacific and other roads. Altogether the Baldwins have built more than 50,000 locomotives of one kind or another, and their locomotives are used in hauling cars all over the world. They are, as I have said, only one of the thirty or forty locomotive factories of the United States, but they are perhaps the best example of an industry which is bound to grow in importance throughout the war and which will be of enormous value in the rehabilitation of the world when peace comes.

Luther Burbank for Corn

LUTHER BURBANK was misquoted in the statement attributed to him that a corn diet is injurious to health. He says: "I am in thorough sympathy with the effort to get corn more generally introduced into the dietary of the United States. It is in my opinion the best cereal food, except wheat and rice, and people should by all means be encouraged to use it far more liberally than it has been used, as it supplies all of the elements of nutrition in nearly the right proportions and will take the place of so much meat with great advantage to the health of those who use it. It will certainly be far better to use a good proportion of it rather than so much fine white flour."

Plenty of Food

HERE is the most convenient and practical way to practice food and fuel conservation. With Conservo you may can 14 quart jars of fruit or vegetables at one time—with Conservo you can cook an entire meal at one time—over one burner of your stove.

CONSERVO

Conserves Food—Fuel—Time

It conserves, serves and saves. No housewife can afford to be without it. In canning, a new delicacy of flavor is secured and the rare flavor of fresh fruits and vegetables is retained. In cooking, the food is cooked in its own moisture. No water necessary. Thus saving the valuable mineral salts and juices.

The fuel saved by Conservo will pay for it in a short time. And the worry and watching of cooking is eliminated.

Raising Twelve Children on $20 a Month

A LOUISIANA negro school teacher is not only bringing up his twelve motherless children on his meager salary of $20 a month, but he has sent his oldest son to college and fitted him for the ministry. Naturally this has not been done without assistance. He is in need of assistance now. His pitiful letter makes its own appeal:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: Your reputation for genuine generosity is world-wide and you will understand very readily why I address you this letter. There are persons in this world to whom persons in need rarely appeal. Their hearts are known to be callous, and no matter how heartrending the conditions of those in need may be, their invariable reply is a refusal. This is not by any means the first letter that I have addressed to you. I have been the recipient of many copies of the Herald, which brought to me and my family joy and gladness. I have before stated that my parents were slaves, and that I was brought up on a sugar plantation by a mother who had lost one arm in a sugar mill before the Civil War. Her struggles to inspire me with an interest for mental and moral improvement only ended with her death. My father died when I was about five years old, leaving me and one sister to the care of my mother. Fortunately, my father's sister consented to raise my sister. The planter in whose cabin we found a shelter expected me to begin work as soon as I could do any kind of work around his premises. This cut short my chances of attending school, but it did not by any means dampen my ardor for books and mental improvement. By night studies I managed to acquire sufficient proficiency to pass an examination before the public school board, and was granted a third grade certificate. I have taught in this parish for more than twenty-six years consecutively, and am still teaching. I am very thankful to God to be able to say that, though colored, I enjoy the goodwill of the best white citizens of this community. I have been twice married. My first wife only lived a little over three years. There was one child, a girl, the result of our union. By my second wife there are now eleven children, eight boys and three girls. I lost my second wife August 1, 1916. She died in childbirth, leaving a girl eight hours old, now a fine, healthy child running all about.

To say that I have had a struggle to raise such a large family goes without saying. The salary of $20 per month, which has been the rule here for teachers of the third grade in colored schools, made the lot of all colored teachers hard indeed. I thank the Lord that there are to be better conditions in the near future. The school terms of 4½ months I believe will be lengthened next year. The help you extended last year came just at a time that I was almost in despair. My youngest children needed clothes for the winter and I was not able to put on such clothes as to keep up appearance as a public school teacher. Therefore I appealed to you for aid, requesting that you use your best endeavor to send me some second-hand articles to help me through the winter. Instead of old clothes, you kindly forwarded a check for $12, which I am sure was a direct answer to prayer, for it came at a time of my greatest extremity. I am a Christian and have done my best to instruct my children religiously. I am a member of the A. M. E. Church, and have served for years as secretary, trustee, steward, superintendent of Sunday school and class-leader. It has been quite a task to keep my children in school and provide clothing, books and the necessities of life. I still hope to see some result for all of my labors. One son—the eldest—has attended college and is now pastor of a church in this town, although he is only about twenty-two years old. I have hopes of seeing him become a strong worker in the Master's cause. If possible to help me through this winter, if you can interest some friend to send a few old clothes to my youngest children, whose respective ages are five years, four years and one year, you will help me more than you can realize.

The Christian Herald is constantly in receipt of notice of similarly deserving cases. A considerable fund for immediate relief in many directions would be a genuine helpfulness at present.

The World's Need.*

IT may be that through all the years in which we have prayed "Thy Kingdom come," we have had neither a clear vision of the Kingdom, nor a glowing loyalty to its perfect plan. But we live in the beginning of a new era. The great essentials of life are clearer today than ever before. Earth's need of a Kingdom of God is everywhere acknowledged. With increasing force you have felt this, as you have climbed with the King these three tragic years. And you have felt that he was leading you to this mount of vision for some personal touch, some word of power that should make you his inspired messenger, his victorious soldier. If you are ready, that word will be spoken, that touch will be given. And when it comes you will be "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might"; you will henceforth pray "Thy Kingdom come" with a new knowledge and a new loyalty. That prayer will conquer the enemies who threaten the Kingdom of God within you. That prayer will reveal countless opportunities for service for humanity, for the King and the Kingdom; opportunities in your own family, your city, your parish, your school, your office—you will see them all as strategic centers to be completely won and kept for the King. That prayer will rob danger and difficulty of all their darkness and make them radiant with the light of the King's presence. "Thy Kingdom come" is a key which opens all things, but only when the key is thrust into the lock. Obey that prayer and you will feel the calm certainty which moved a farmer to place on a weather-vane on his barn the words "God is Love," and in answer to the question why he placed such a changeless truth on anything so variable, replied: "Because I want my neighbors to see that I know that God is love, whichever way the wind blows."

possible. She is redeeming mankind today, and no one in America can afford to miss her blessing. At this moment the most precious rights of humanity are trembling in the scale. Millions have died for these, perhaps millions more must die. But they must not die in vain. The victory will be gained for the light of the world. Yes, but it cannot come until the armies of light are united in purpose and principle, in complete, self-sacrificing loyalty to the King of kings and his truth.

That is the answer to the question: How long will the war last? It will last until Sacrifice leads us unto the heart of life's meaning. Some day the world will love Sacrifice, and not compel war to bring her to our homes. Health is God's will for us, not disease; and peace, not war. But when our neglect or disobedience brings pain; when we bring on war, the Good Physician must offer the bitter draught to effect a cure, the Divine Surgeon must cut deeply to save the life. The war must not end until it ends right. A thousand times you have heard that said. It is true. The soul is of more value than the body, and the soul of the world than the bodies of millions. The faithful ones are with Christ, and none can hurt those who ride with him in the army of heaven.

The Progress of the War

ALONG the whole western front, for another week, fierce artillery duels have continued with trench raids more and more approaching in their extent minor attacks. In upper Alsace, on Feb. 24, at Lower Aspach the French penetrated deeply into the German lines destroying German defense works and bringing back 15 prisoners and a machine-gun, but left 14 prisoners in German hands. The English also captured prisoners in a raid near Broodseinde northeast of Ypres.

American troops in company with a French patrol penetrated the German lines in the Chemin des Dames sector on Feb. 24, aiding in the capture of two German officers, 20 men and one machine gun. There were no American casualties in this raid. On the same day Gen. Pershing reported the death of 5 airmen killed in accidents at the training camps. It was also announced from Washington that Gen. Pershing had received several 12-inch rifles and some 14-inch naval guns mounted for service on land, the 14-inch gun being the most powerful in the war next to the guns of British battleship Queen Elizabeth. Some of these guns had also been sent to Italy.

The sector northwest of Toul held by American troops saw some hard fighting during the week. On the 25th, a German bombardment with gas shells killed six men and sent 80 to the hospital; the men not adjusting their gas-masks quickly enough. The guns from which these shells came were destroyed the next day by the American artillery.

It was announced on the 27th that the total American loss to that date was 100 men killed, wounded or missing.

On the first of March the Germans made the attack on the American trenches in Lorraine for which their gas attacks and intense bombardments were intended to pave the way. They sent forward some 240 men behind a sweeping barrage, but when these men jumped into the first line American trenches they met American bayonets and fists. While this hand to hand struggle was proceeding, an American captain of the West Point class of 1917 led his men into No-Man's Land and waited for the Germans to start back home. When they tumbled out of the American trenches, those that were left to tumble, he met them with a terrific cross fire. While this struggle was continuing in trenches and before the wire entanglements, the American artillery began sweeping the ground in front of the German lines, catching many running Prussians who had had enough of American ways of fighting. The attack was made by men of the Seventy-eighth Reserve Division of Hanover. Losses were heavy on both sides. The American trenches and the ground in front held many German dead when the fight was over and three were taken prisoners. General Pershing later reported the names of twenty-five men wounded in action and of two others accidentally killed, and on March 3 he sent the names of a lieutenant and 4 men killed in the fight of March 1, and of 8 others wounded. The report of March 3 also carried the names of 5 men wounded in other actions, of 4 killed, of 2 dead of wounds, and of 5 dead from various diseases. Complete plans of the American positions were found on the body of a German captain.

American troops on the Aisne front, on Feb. 28, repulsed a strong German attack which followed a heavy barrage fire. There were no American casualties in this action although one man was killed and two wounded by enemy shell fire. A German gas attack left one American soldier dead and 8 suffering from the effects of the gas. The men in these actions were reported to be New England troops. An attack near Chavignon was driven back by French and American troops on March 1. Berlin claimed ten American prisoners.

It was reported on Feb. 28 that a court martial had sentenced to death 4 American soldiers caught sleeping on sentry duty but that Gen. Pershing, though having authority to carry out the sentence, had referred the cases to the War Department for review. The same report told of one American soldier executed for a murder by assault upon a French child. Gen. Pershing in this case acted swiftly under the authority vested in him.

On Feb. 27 the British hospital ship Glenart Castle, recently repaired, was torpedoed and sunk in the Bristol Channel. The ship went down in seven minutes. She was outward bound to France to bring back wounded. Of the 350 persons on board over 160 were lost.

U-boats during the week sank 14 British vessels of over 1,600 tons, 4 under that tonnage and 7 fishing vessels. One French ship was sunk, while Italian shipping escaped. The Spanish steamer Neguri, the fifth in recent weeks, was torpedoed near the Canary Islands.

For a number of months there have been reports of a German raider in the South Seas, but the sea is large and the utmost efforts of the Allied navies did not suffice to run the raider down, although one or two vessels she had turned into commerce raiders were overtaken.

On Feb. 25 Berlin announced "The auxiliary cruiser Wolf has returned home after 15 months in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific oceans." The British admiralty credited the Wolf with having sunk 11 ships which had previously been reported missing. The German admiralty, however, on the 27th declared that the Wolf had destroyed at least 25 enemy merchant vessels or vessels in enemy trade with an aggregate tonnage of 210,000.

This Concrete Road

Makes possible efficient, economical operation of motor trucks between Dundee, Illinois, and Chicago. And continuous, successful motor truck operation requires concrete roads—that will stand up under heavily loaded trucks traveling at high speed.

There would be less likelihood of food or fuel shortages if concrete roads were everywhere, so that motor trucks could operate uninterruptedly between farm and town, town and city, transporting promptly as wanted the things needed by homes and industries.

Hard roads vitally affect the wage earner, the business man, the farmer—YOU. They are a prime factor in fighting the high cost of living. They are essential to an early winning of the war.

Let us tell you where concrete roads are standing up under the heaviest traffic, how little the burden of their cost, how insignificant their maintenance.

CONCRETE FOR PERMANENCE

CALL UP FAMILY CIRCLE, PLEASE!

The Editor Has Another Little Phone Talk with Our Friends

I THINK it was in November that I last had the pleasure of a visit on the phone with my friends of the Family Circle. And how these months have sped, with their heavy snows and zero spells and their meatless, heatless, wheatless days and their burden of domestic cares! Yet God is good and Spring is on the way, and there are signs a-plenty that the war is breaking up and that there is to be an end of the sorrow and sighing.

Seated here at the phone, imagination brings before me the picture of many family groups of my friends in their own homes. The wood fire crackles and sings. The sparks fly from the logs and the glow gives the room a homelike, cheery aspect. Mother is in her favorite rocker and father sits nearby, and they chat in lowered tones while the younger folks amuse themselves. Perhaps they talk of the son who is away at the camp, or it may be of a daughter who is with the Red Cross. The war has brought changes to many of our home circles, but, thank God, we are trusting Him to bring the loved ones back to us. We know they are safe in His keeping, and this is what gives us strength to bear the separation.

I can picture to myself your young folks, spending the long winter evenings sometimes in reading or singing, or the girls knitting sweaters for our boys at the front, and even the old folks "doing their bit" in some way to help the nation. And then there's the Bible Picture Study, which I know many of you have already in your homes. What a fine way it opens to make the boys and girls acquainted with God's Word!

As you know, we have already had two Bible Picture Studies in the last two years, aggregating 100,000 contestants. This year's study promises to be the biggest of all, as we have made it a part of the International Sunday School Lessons. And the charm of it is that the whole thing can be done right by your own fireside, with the older and wiser heads directing the younger. Every picture in the series is related to the International Sunday School Lessons or the Daily Home Readings, or the Golden Texts, for December, 1917, and the first four months of 1918, so that the Study really accomplishes a double purpose: it familiarizes each contestant with the 2,000 Bible verses which are read and explained in the course of the Sunday School Lessons and Daily Home Readings all over the land, and gives each a chance to earn a substantial reward. If you have not yet introduced the Bible Picture Study in your home, I would strongly urge you to do so now. The enrollment will close on April 22, 1918 (but participants will have until May 31, 1918, to send in their Answers), and I am sure you will find the experience one which you would not miss for a great deal, if only for the moral and spiritual good that is done to the children, besides making them capital Bible scholars. Then, too, there are $5,000.00 to be distributed in a thousand-and-one rewards, the prizes being graded from $1,000.00 down to $2.00.

But far above all the prizes you will value the benefit to the young contestants, for "Searching the Scriptures" gives wisdom and a knowledge of God and His will, which, after all, is the chief end of our life here.

You remember the story of the mother who gave to her son, as he was starting out in the world, a Bible. "My boy," she said, "I have no money to give you; but within the covers of this Book lie the greatest riches; seek until you find them." The lad searched the Bible and found great riches, not few, but many—among them salvation, high ideals, noble purposes and success in all his undertakings, for he modeled his life upon the principles he found there, and he realized the truth of the promise that God honors them that fear him and serve him according to his Word. For search of the Scriptures can never be in vain. It brings enlightenment of mind, enlivenment of the heart and enrichment of life. Happy, indeed, are those who begin this search in childhood, for their whole lives are formed true to truth.

This is why I am talking with you today, for it is on my heart to impress upon all my friends of the Family Circle that study of the Bible is, first of all, a duty, and then it becomes a pleasure. Ask any Christian man or woman of your acquaintance if it is not so, and they will tell you from experience that it is to them a joy which they would not miss for all the world. I have by me a note from one of the doubly successful contestants in the last Bible Picture Study, which says: "Thanks for the prize received; but the greatest prize I got out of the Bible Study is the abiding zest and joy with which I now study the Bible." So this is why I am talking with you today, in the hope that every home where the Christian Herald goes may have some members of its little flock enrolled in this delightful Study. I would feel that I had missed a great opportunity if I did not urge this upon you.

Speaking to my friends of the Circle through the telephone makes me think of the story of Gyges, the "invisible visitor." He found a ring which, when he turned it round on his finger, with the signet palmward, made him invisible, so he could go where he pleased. Now, to talk over the phone is rather a poor apology for a personal visit, and some of these days, ring or no ring, I hope to spend a good deal of time in making a round of real visits among you; but it must be when peace has healed the wounds of war.

Here we publish three Seeds to scatter among friends and acquaintances. Will you help by handing them around? Please do so—cut them out, and hand or mail them to friends. Let us work now as never before, for this is planting time, and the seed of Christian love will grow if we but plant it!

So good-by for a time, dear Family Circle of the Christian Herald. I have had you on the wire a long time today, but I had important tidings to give you.

Managing Editor.

This 3/4-Ton Reo Will Serve You "Coming" as Well as "Going"

Mr. Merchant, had you thought of this?

You need no longer depend upon the uncertain supply of green goods, eggs, butter and other farm produce which varies with the weather and the farmer's mood.

One day a feast—an over supply. The next a famine.

Nor need you trundle down to the city market at four A. M., paw over tons of stuff vainly searching for a little of the quality you like to serve your customers.

Your 3/4-ton Reo "Hurry Up Wagon" will serve you just as well—and even more profitably in the collection of such goods—as in the delivery of them.

Instead of waiting to see whether one or fifty farmers come with the fresh things you need—why not go to the source and be sure not only of the quantity but the quality you desire.

Phone the farmer, or truck gardener, the night before. Tell him the market quotations and how much of each kind you'll need.

He'll have them ready, and in less time than you'd waste in jostling and haggling in the market for "fresh" produce that has already become stale and half spoiled by handling, your Reo will be back to the store with the day's needs of the freshest and choicest.

This Reo is ideal for such service. Being pneumatic tired, it will negotiate rough country roads just as easily as does your Reo touring car. Speed is 22 miles per hour normal.

And upkeep is the lowest of any truck of similar capacity—your Reo dealer has the figures to prove that.

The difference you'll pay for farm and garden produce by this plan will soon pay for your Reo Truck—for every farmer knows it costs him more to deliver by horses, than to raise his stuff.

If he figures he gets paid a fair price for his produce—then the team works for nothing; and if he gets wages for the team—he gives away his produce.

Under this plan you can buy cheaper—and he will net more.

Your supply will be steady and of superior quality.

At both ends, this Reo will make money for you and increase your trade tremendously.

For fresh goods and quick delivery service are the two greatest factors in business building today.

See this Reo Truck—ask your Reo dealer for facts and figures.

Then place your order at once—for demand is great and output this year is necessarily limited.

Only those who order early can hope to obtain Reos.

Gave Her Life to Save Men

THERE are men and women living in these days of whom it may be said truthfully, as it was spoken of the martyrs in Paul's time, that they were those "of whom the world was not worthy." Such a career was that of Letha Watts, a frail young Southern woman, who identified herself with the work of the Prisoners' Relief Society of Washington, D. C., almost from the day of its foundation.

Shortly after Earle E. Dudding organized the Prisoners' Relief Society, and opened his office in Huntington, West Virginia, he found that he needed the services of a stenographer. Mr. Dudding had known what it was to be a prisoner, and in his own personal experience he had felt the obloquy and the lack of consideration which such a one must face at the hands of society, in the struggle for rehabilitation as a self-supporting citizen. He had been converted before his liberation, and he had made it the great business of his life to form an organization which should not only help the families and dependents of prisoners while they were deprived of their wage-earners and providers, but which would aid the convicts in finding employment after release. In his operations it was necessary for him to be away from Huntington—where the Society had its offices—a good deal of the time.

The morning on which his advertisement for a stenographer appeared, "a slip of a girl" came into the office and said she had read it and had come to take the position. She talked so brightly that she impressed Mr. Dudding. She had been a resident of Huntington all her life, where her people were well thought of but poor. Somewhat gruffly, he told her to sit down at the machine and demonstrate her ability as a stenographer and typist. The trial was satisfactory, and the nineteen-year old girl was engaged and entered upon her duties. And there was certainly work enough to do. She was loaded up with letters, for the Society found sympathetic support in many places; but she faced the work bravely and did it so well that very soon she was in full charge of the office. She became, as Mr. Dudding says, "the brains of the organization, and her enthusiasm and ability carried things along as I could never have done alone." After a time, and when she had thoroughly identified herself with the work, she went out with Mr. Dudding on some of his speaking tours in behalf of the organization, and fairly divided the honors with him.

The time came, however, when the little, slender figure could no longer stand up under the strain that was put upon it. The slim girl had become, in addition to her other duties, treasurer of the organization, which multiplied her work greatly. Moreover, she had served at a merely nominal salary, for she knew that the Relief Society was still struggling, and that every dollar that came into the treasury was needed for work among the thousands of prisoners for whom it was endeavoring to provide a way of rehabilitation. Through her own efforts positions had been secured for many of them, and they had been put on the right road that led back to manhood and to honest lives.

Then the time came when Letha Watts grew so feeble and sick that she was no longer fit to perform her office duties; yet she would not give in. Finally she was removed to her home, but the care and attention that were bestowed upon her came too late. She lingered for some time, always thinking of her work and inquiring how the Society was progressing. She had given it more than three years of her life, and had put into those years all of her strength and ability. Feeling the end near, she dictated a message for Mr. Dudding and asked some one to take it for him. It was her last conscious act. She closed her eyes and soon passed away. The rest of the story is told by Mr. Dudding.

"This was the message which poor Letha left for me, and I know that she was thinking, even at the moment of death, of what she could do for others:

"Dear Dr. Dudding: Leaving this world of pain and sorrow 6:30 p. m., to where I'll be happy with all who have been faithful.

LETHA ALDERSON WATTS."

"I sent, to be laid upon her breast, twenty-four lilies, representing her age, for she was twenty-four in last December. She was a splendid Christian girl, and literally gave her life for others. These poor fellows owe her a debt of gratitude which they can never repay. I feel that it was a great privilege to have such a consecrated helper in our work, and that her association with us was a great blessing."

Miss Watts is survived by her mother only. She has an uncle who is or was a practicing physician in Huntington.

In her work for the Prisoners' Relief Society she knew no hours and recognized only work to be done. She burned the midnight oil night after night, when as a matter of fact she should have been away in a different climate, under conditions that might have led to physical restoration. But she would not leave her work nor could she be driven away.

The Prisoners' Relief Society will greatly miss the services of this devoted worker. Mr. Dudding himself is an invalid; yet he is giving every ounce of his strength to the work. Many of the Christian Herald readers have taken an interest in the organization and have helped it to carry through its efforts for the prisoners, and it is hoped that many more will do so. The inspiration of this girl's example should stir many to help a movement that was worthy of such loving service.

There could be no finer appreciation to Letha Watts than for a host of friends to help the struggling Prisoners' Relief Society and put it on a secure foundation, as a memorial to this young girl who, like a true martyr, gave her life for others.

Missionaries in the Midst of Rebellion

THIS letter comes to us from a well-known missionary in China: "Your kind letter of 16th Nov. 1917, with enclosed check for $50, to hand. Many thanks. We are having just now a time of great unrest in the provinces. On Dec. 11, a great number of our soldiers in Sian rebelled. Their plan was to kill the governor. They were not successful in this plan, but for two days and nights we had a general fight in the city. The rebels got possession of the South City gate, the Central Tower in the city and several other important places. It was not pleasant to be right in it, I must say! About 600 people were killed and a good deal of property destroyed; but I am glad to say that no foreigners were hurt nor their property molested. Both parties seemed to take good care not to do any damage to the foreigners. This is quite a change from the attitude of 1900. When the rebels were driven out of the city, they fled south and west from Sian. They have since then been fighting at several places and a number of soldiers have been killed on both sides, together with a great number of civilians. There is a great deal of unrest still in Sian and the merchants have their shops closed. The Bank of China has sent to us their valuable papers and a large sum of money for safe keeping. They trust our premises, which are undefended, better than their own place, which is guarded by soldiers!

"In spite of all this political unrest, the Mission work is going on very successfully. I think this is the best year in the history of our Mission. I believe a greater number of new converts have been added to our various churches during this year than we received during our first fifteen years of work in China. We have, as a mission, great cause to be thankful to God for this great success. To him be the glory for all. Permit me, on behalf of our Mission, to thank the Christian Herald for all it has done for us in supporting orphans and native helpers. Sian, Shensi. "W. H. HAGQVIST."

FOOD

Will Win The War PRODUCE IT!

The United States Government has advertised that Food Will Win the War! Surely without food our armies could not endure. So even should you serve in no other way, plant a garden and help Win the War!

Food is Scarce—Labor is Scarce

The farmer's son has gone to war, so who then is to increase the production of food? Vegetable food must be grown in the home garden! Every man and every woman and every child who can possibly do so must plant a garden and produce food. If you have a backyard only 20 feet by 20 feet you can produce vegetable food enough for your family for many months. You can reduce the high cost of living! But not only this, by growing your own vegetables you are releasing just that much food for our Army and our Allies abroad. FOOD WILL WIN THE WAR—PRODUCE IT!

If you have never had a garden then start to plan one now. To make it easy for you we have prepared a special Collection of Vegetable Seeds for the Home Garden. This Dollar Box of Vegetable Seeds is listed below. It contains sixteen Burpee Specialties, a garden plan and cultural leaflet—and all are mailed to your door for $1.00. Just send a dollar bill and ask for Collection No. B 16.

KING "8"

The KNOWN Car Will Have A "Waiting List" This Year

UTILITY is now the national buying reason. The public wants only cars of proved reliability built by established companies. With output reduced because of war manufacture there will be a shortage of preferred cars. If you expect to buy a KING this year, ORDER EARLY.

Following a successful but smaller "Eight" and a popular "Four," this sixty horse power King is beginning its third year of world-wide operation, with practically no mechanical change except a general refinement which continues at all times. The chassis has proved its power, stamina and economy in every climate the world over and its recent use for armored cars and war ambulances is final evidence of its reliability under all conditions.

The King "Foursome"—a body type originated by this Company, and now widely followed—was declared by many to be the handsomest at the New York Automobile Show. You are urged to examine and drive this remarkable car. A 7-passenger Touring Car and a 7-passenger Sedan are two other popular King models.

Writing home. Letters tie the spirit of the home to the life of the camp

© Underwood & Underwood

PROBABLY not one in a thousand among our average citizens has any adequate notion of the extent and variety of the work that is going on in Uncle Sam's training-camps. In spite of the fact that almost all the camps have many visitors, few of these stay long enough as a rule to see more than what lies on the surface. There is an inner life at each of the camps which is not apparent to the casual observer, but which has very much to do with results, both as to moral character and physical efficiency.

It is just about a year ago since Secretary of War Baker appointed the Commission on Training-Camp Activities, under the chairmanship of Raymond B. Fosdick of New York. Its duty was to supply the normalities of life to nearly a million and a half young men who would pass through these camps in due course, as well as to keep the outskirts of the camps clean and wholesome, physically and morally. When it is remembered that these boys in camp have left families, homes, friends, clubs, churches and college gatherings, libraries, athletics and their customary amusements—in fact, all the ordinary social relationships to which they have been accustomed—to enter on a strange, new life in which almost everything is subordinated to the need of creating an efficient fighting force, the importance of the Commission's work becomes apparent. Contentment for the average man cannot be maintained without the normal relations of life, and it is this task—the establishment as far as possible of social ties and recreational and relaxational opportunities—which has been the duty of the Commission. It goes without saying that a very important part of that task has been to prevent and suppress those vicious influences which are ordinarily associated with military training-camps, and this has been done most thoroughly and effectively.

TO the success of the Commission's plans, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the American Library Association, the Playground and Recreation Association, the Travelers' Aid Society, and a number of other organizations have largely contributed. Healthful sports, singing classes, entertainments, moving pictures and other forms of amusement help to pass away the leisure time agreeably. Each camp has its post office, its cooperative store and its regimental exchange.

When it is remembered that some of the camps contain as many as 50,000 men, the problem of arranging and ordering the leisure time is by no means a small one. The Y. M. C. A. is a leader in all healthful recreative arrangements, and its entertainments are free of charge. Its religious work is absolutely non-sectarian. Each cantonment of the National Army and each National Guard camp has its own recreational and social buildings. The average auditorium seats about 3,000, and there are considerably over 300 buildings of this extent, either completed or under way. There are over 150 tents, 40 x 80 feet, and 400 special outfits or equipments, for Association work, an outfit including piano, motion-picture machine, phonograph, office supplies, postcards, pens, ink, stationery and reading-matter, all free to the young soldiers. It is estimated that the entire equipment of the Y. M. C. A., in all the training camps together, will cost ultimately about $11,000,000, which is furnished by private subscription. There are over 2,000 war work secretaries in the field under appointment, with a thousand more coming. These include physical and educational directors; indeed, it is the aim of the organization to supply every service for which there is a legitimate demand. In the largest sense, the Y. M. C. A. has come to be the "big brother" of our National Army.

To still further stimulate the social side of camp life, a weekly newspaper of eight pages, called Trench and Camp, is being published and circulated in each of the thirty-two national guard and army camps, under Y. M. C. A. auspices. Each of these has the local doings of the camp in which it is circulated. The Association buildings are freely placed at the disposal of army chaplains for religious services, and the gatherings are so regulated that the same building can be used in turn for Protestant, Catholic and Hebrew worship.

ONE outstanding feature of the work that is being done for the new troops is that conducted by the Playground and Recreation Association of America. Nearly 100 communities are being helped and directed in their efforts to make life agreeable for the thousands of men in the camps near them. Eighty-seven representatives of the Playground Association are engaged in this preparatory work, and care is taken that the recreations should be clean, wholesome and abundant. The cities near the camps are taking generous interest in the work of doing what they can to lessen the tedium of camp life for the soldier boys. "Take a soldier home for dinner," has become a popular slogan. On one Sunday, in a single community, 5,000 of the boys were thus entertained, each carrying away a pleasant recollection of a delightful afternoon. The contiguous cities have placed at the soldiers' disposal their public amusement sources, including swimming-pool, shower bath and baseball fields, and many of them have installed "comfort stations" and drinking fountains, "rest rooms" and khaki clubs, while automobile rides, community song services and band concerts fill up many an afternoon and evening's program pleasantly. Soldiers' families or relatives who visit the camp are also taken care of, and the Y. W. C. A. is putting up a number of "hostess houses" for the special purpose of providing a place within the camp where a soldier can meet his family and friends.

One of the worst features of army camp life in the past has been the "red light" districts. These have been sternly excluded, under the direction of the Commission, and in a number of places there has been a clean sweep of the vicious element, notably at Deming, New Mexico; El Paso, Waco, San Antonio, Fort Worth and Houston, Texas; Hattiesburg, Miss.; Spartanburg, S. C.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Alexandria, La.; Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, Columbia and Greenville, S. C.; Douglas, Ariz.; Louisville, Ky.; Montgomery, Ala., and New Orleans, La. Vice resorts, wherever they existed in the neighborhood of a camp, have been abolished.

"The average of intelligence in our ranks is as high as that of the officers' corps in any other army," said Brigadier-General O'Neil, commanding one of the infantry brigades at Camp Travis. General O'Neil has seen thirty years' service in Uncle Sam's regular fighting force and knows whereof he speaks. He urges those men in the new National Army who may have natural qualifications as officers to train themselves unceasingly for higher posts.

A few Sundays ago Camp Upton was the scene of a remarkable religious service. It was the opening of the new church headquarters adjoining the administrative building of the Y. M. C. A. It was erected by a committee which represented six different communions: Baptist, Congregationalist, Episcopalian, Lutheran, Methodist and Presbyterian; and it is open to all the religious bodies represented in the camp. The first meeting was addressed by the commanding general, who expressed his cordial sympathy with the project and spoke highly of the value of the religious forces to the morale of his troops. The Camp Upton Church is not a union church, but a headquarters where each communion, in its own way, can make provision for the spiritual needs of its own followers. If they choose to worship together, there is nothing to prevent.

The Soldier's View of Camp Life

By T. H. Alvord

AN army Y. M. C. A. secretary requested the men who were sitting around his bungalow writing letters to put down on paper a frank statement of the value the Association has been to them. The result was interesting and illuminating, for practically the entire range of Y. M. C. A. activities was covered. The educational, physical, social and religious values were expressed, and then besides there was a certain note running through the letters indicated by one of the men when he said: "A letter such as this is difficult to write, because it deals with those things one feels rather than sees and talks about."

The policy of the Young Men's Christian Association has always been to minister to the mental, physical, social and spiritual natures of men. If a man is to be equipped to his highest capacity, his intellect must be developed, his body cared for, his social instincts given play and his moral and spiritual fibers strengthened. The entire program of the Y. M. C. A. in the training-camps is based upon this premise. In accord with it the Association has in each camp an educational, physical, social and religious work director, and this man is in every case responsible for all of his department activities, which are carried on by the respective secretaries in each bungalow. Each has its important place in the four-fold program. Each contributes a definite factor toward the development of Christian character. Each is fundamentally essential. And this must not be lost sight of or misunderstood—that the underlying object actuating the efforts of every department and of every secretary is to make Christianity vital. "This life would seem almost impossible to some of us if it were not for the Y. M. C. A. It certainly

The temptations of army life are severe. Every one knows it. And a man can slip so very gradually that he has to watch himself every minute. Here the Y. M. C. A. performs effective work—the conserving of those religious standards which both the men and the officers possessed in civilian life. Take these statements; they are significant: "I, as a soldier in the field, say that without the Y. M. C. A. many a man would fall, not in battle, but in sin. I know, for I myself am one of those men." And this, from a sergeant: "There are many things the Y. M. C. A. does for me, but the greatest is this—it brings Christ nearer daily. I believe the Y. M. C. A. in the army will be the cause of thousands of boys striving to live clean, Christian lives during this war, boys who otherwise would perhaps forget God entirely. One thing it is doing for me is keeping me clean and conscientious, with a desire to live right and a determination to come out of this war as good a man as I was when I entered."

Many are the boys who have kept true to their mothers' teachings; many are the mothers' earnest prayers which have been answered, because in the camp there is the Army Y. M. C. A. Every Sunday morning, Bible classes are held in the Y. M. C. A. bungalows, frequently around the fireplace, and the greatest interest is manifested in these simple, informal meetings. Following them come the services in the bungalow auditoriums, the buildings at this time being at the disposal of the regimental chaplains. And in the evening another service is held under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. and made attractive usually by special music. One other evening of the week, also, is devoted to a distinctly religious service in the bungalows, largely a song service, and the atmosphere which pervades that meeting is of the finest and most refreshing kind.

ONE feature of the Y. M. C. A. policy is to organize group activities in each company, so that when the company leaves camp it may take with it the definite group organization. With this in mind a definite goal is mapped out for Bible class work. An organized class in each company; a multiplication of small groups composed, for example, of squad members, fraternity brothers, graduates of the same college; the formation of a plan to discover and train leaders from the ranks; the enlistment of men in carrying the Testament; the development of a camp atmosphere which makes it as natural for a soldier to carry a Testament as to carry his gun. The Bible classes meet regularly in the barracks week-day evenings, moral and spiritual questions are frankly discussed, and as a result individual men are brought closer to Christ and the tone of the barrack life is greatly improved. A case demonstrating a value of group religious activities is found in one of the Eastern cantonments, where, on the Sunday following total quarantine, 183 religious meetings were held throughout the camp by the soldiers themselves.

"Dear Dad," one soldier writes home after he has been in camp for a few weeks and the novelty of the new life has worn off, "I want to tell you that since I've been here I've discovered that I have a soul, that my soul needs a Saviour, and that that Saviour is Jesus Christ." This is not a solitary example.

The new church headquarters at Camp Upton does a world of good." "No words can express the feeling of fellowship that the Y. M. C. A. has given in the camp here. Not only has everything been done for the comfort and pleasure of the men, but the way in which it has been done shows that the men in charge of the work are Christian gentlemen." "I would rather spend my evenings at the 'Y' than in town or anywhere else." "The Y. M. C. A. surely is performing a wonderful work, and the Y. M. C. A. men do all in their power to make our life more cheerful." "If a soldier has the blues," says an officer, "take him into a Y. M. C. A. building, and he'll be all right again in a little while."

THESE few expressions from soldiers, possible of duplication hundreds of times, and showing a certain impression which the Y. M. C. A. makes upon the lives of men, are quoted by no means to minimize the value of distinctly religious work in the camp or to intimate that it is unnecessary. Far from it. The purpose is rather to suggest the attitude which it is very essential to create among the men in order to make the religious work most effective. The Y. M. C. A. secretary approaches his task with the definite object of developing Christian character, but he realizes fully that the means to that end is service, that the rendering of service means a point of contact. And so he simply plays the part of a man among men, doing with a contagious smile and a cordial and response-drawing greeting the endless number of helpful tasks.

"Well, where've you been?" was the outburst of a rough soldier in a bungalow a few nights ago. And as the secretary addressed replied that he had been away sick, the reply came back, "If you'd been here I wouldn't be putting in time at the guardhouse now." "Why?" asked the secretary. "Because when I used to come over here evenings to the 'Y' to see the shows and while away the time, we were pretty good friends, you know. But after you left, somehow, I got tired of coming over. And then one night I shot off to the city and overstayed my pass three days. Now the guardhouse for me."

PENDING the meeting at Moscow, on March 12, of the All Russian Congress of Workmen's and Soldiers' delegates to which had been referred the ratification of the treaty of peace, the German advance into Russia ended for the time being with the consolidation of the line between Jamburg, on the railway from Reval to Petrograd and only sixty-eight miles from the capital, and Gdoff, east of Lake Peipus and south of Narva.

It was reported in Petrograd that banks had been reopened, the property of landlords restored and other conditions approaching the old régime revived in towns occupied by the Germans.

Notwithstanding the signing of peace, the Bolshevik government continued arrangements to transfer all the state institutions to Moscow, Nizhni-Novgorod, and Kaza. The Bolshevik leaders were prepared to withdraw even as far as to the Ural Mountains rather than submit to the defeat of the revolution; and Leon Trotzky was quoted as declaring a holy war to be possible. United States Ambassador Francis was, on March 7, temporarily quartered with the Siamese and Brazilian diplomats at Vologda. A few Red Cross and publicity workers were still in Petrograd.

The Petrograd Council, while recognizing the German terms as those of "political bandits," was told by M. Zinovieff, its president, that Russia's representatives were obliged to sign the peace agreement as a tactical measure owing to the situation brought about by the Ukraine's acceptance of ignominious peace terms. The Petrograd Council instructed its representatives to Moscow to vote to ratify the compact signed at Brest-Litovsk.

Agreement between the Bolsheviks and Germany regarding the independence of Finland was followed by a peace and trade treaty between Germany and Finland, signed on March 8. Finland, by the conditions of the treaty, agreed not to cede any territory or grant territorial rights to any foreign power without the previous consent of Germany, who undertook to exert herself to secure the recognition of Finland's independence by all the powers. Germany's intervention in Finland at first appeared likely to give offense to Sweden, whose troops were already occupying the Aland Islands, but Sweden did not object when it was shown that the action was in answer to Finland's request.

A peace and trade treaty between Rumania and the Central Powers was signed March 5. It provided for the cession to the Central Powers of the Dobrudja as far as the Danube and portions of the frontier region of Rumania bordering on Austria-Hungary. Rumania also undertook to further the transport of Teutonic troops through Moldavia and Bessarabia to Odessa. In the German Reichstag the Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs said regarding the future of the Rumanian throne that the dynastic question in Rumania was an internal one.

Is the Food Administration Worth While?

By HOWARD
B. GROSE, D.D.

THE United States Food Administration has been going now for six months. Is it worth while?

The independent American citizen certainly has a right to ask this question of an organization which presumes to dictate how many slices of white bread he can have at a hotel or restaurant; interferes with his regular habits by prescribing all sorts of meals and days—wheatless, meatless, porkless, almost everything but eatless; declares that hoarding of necessities is a peculiarly heinous crime punishable by $5,000 fine or two years' imprisonment or both, whether the hoarder be a firm or individual; puts producers and distributors of foods under license; pledges millions of families to membership in the biggest voluntary governmental organization on record; and in a word, proposes to change the food habits of a nation, willy nilly.

And this question and others are still asked, in spite of all the information that the Christian Herald and other papers have given concerning this new thing in our history. Hence this answer.

Is it worth while? To answer one question by another, in Yankee fashion, What is the supreme purpose for which the Food Administration was established and exists? That supreme purpose is to secure and ship over seas for the armies fighting our battles and the Allies back of them, the food necessary to feed them all and win the war.

It is essential that the American people understand that this is the supreme purpose. To this every energy is bent. For this every appeal is made, every plan projected, every rule and regulation adopted, every order issued. Other things are important but this is all important. "Food will win the war"—that first slogan put out by Mr. Hoover has rung itself into the American consciousness and never been superseded. Its truth becomes steadily more apparent. Each new cable from Lord Rhondda emphasizes it. The conditions in France and Italy drive it home. The growing number of our own boys on the battle-front forces it into our very hearts. Get food over there? We must! And we must keep on doing it as long as the war lasts—and longer.

To do this was what the Food Administration was born for. What was the tremendous two-fold task laid upon it? (1) To ensure the production, conservation and shipment of the vast amounts of wheat, meat, sugar and fats required from us as the only available source of supplies; and (2) To do this while equally ensuring our own people against any serious diminution of their food supplies.

Here was something absolutely necessary to be done, if the war was to be won. To lower the high cost of living was undeniably desirable, but to get food was indispensable. Food must be conserved, regardless of cost or any other consideration, save the health of our people—for we must win the war. Food has been conserved to a remarkable extent. We have not sent abroad all that was needed or asked, for reasons some of which were beyond human control; but we have kept the wolf off the edge of the Allies' front yard, have saved the situation thus far, and intend to save the thirty or more per cent. required to save it permanently. Which sufficiently answers the query, Is it worth while? Why, but for the Food Administration, the Prussian system would almost certainly have been doing in all France today what it has done and is doing in corrupted, disrupted and robbed Russia, in starved Serbia, in ravaged Rumania, in despoiled Belgium and northern France—in all the places it has pillaged and desecrated.

The six months' achievements have been made possible by the voluntary cooperation of the American people and American big business. The securing of

The campaign of education was at once started. Representatives of the varied business interests to be affected were called to Washington for conferences, as were representatives of the churches and fraternal orders with their reach into the homes, of the religious and trade press, farmers' and home journals—the leaders, in a word, of public opinion and commercial activities. The result was that they went away pledged to cooperation; and I believe the Food Administration owes much of the solid support it enjoys to this policy of taking the public into conference, stating the situation frankly, consulting widely, inspiring confidence, and making the people feel that every man, woman and child of them is doing something to help win the war by eating corn bread instead of white bread, by eating more potatoes and less meat, and by all the other ways of substitution.

The educational and informational campaign has been carried on vigorously and continuously. Many think the Food Administration has set a model for output and outreach. By fair and frank treatment it has made the press its invaluable ally. Probably no great movement has ever received more hearty support by the American press, which has not failed to appreciate the significance of food as a war factor. Think what it means when great dailies will print across their front pages such reminders as "This Is Meatless Day," and when papers like The Christian Herald, with such pressure on its space, will give pages like this to further the conservation cause.

Then, too, the public signs greet one everywhere; store windows display food exhibits; attractive posters are found in all communities; informative literature of a practical sort has been sent broadcast but with definite aims; speakers have been furnished to use the potent influence of the human voice and personality in reaching thousands of audiences; local war kitchens have taught how to make substitute foods; the pulpit has lent its aid; chambers of commerce, civic organizations, farmers' institutes, public libraries, chain and department stores—an endless list of helpers have contributed to the common end of bringing the food need home to the people.

Results? For one thing, over 13,000,000 families have signed the pledge cards of Food Administration membership. This means that from fifty to sixty millions of the people, over one-half of our population, belong in this loose but none the less effective sense to the food conserving forces, making this the largest and most remarkable voluntary membership to be found on the globe. As yet we have not been called upon to make anything like real sacrifice. If we should be, this prepared and pledged constituency will be ready.

For another thing, the prodigious nature of which is not easily understood, big business has been brought into voluntary agreement and cooperation to an extent hitherto undreamed of. Three things the Food Administration was bound to prevent, so far as was humanly possible in war time—profiteering, speculation and hoarding. The Food Act did not give sufficient power to stop these vicious practices. It is difficult to appreciate what the results attained through voluntary agreement mean to the country. This made it possible to keep the prices of flour and sugar and other necessities down, where otherwise they would have gone soaring as in other war periods.

this cooperation is in itself a great achievement. The Lever Act establishing the Food Administration gave only limited powers, leaving the larger part of the work to persuasion. Would people of this democracy do voluntarily what in Europe had to be done partly by compulsion? That was the test. The Food Administration declared the utmost confidence in the response if the situation and needs were made clear, and food conservation was seen in its true relation.

President Wilson Halts Japan

LATE in February General Foch, interviewed by an American correspondent, urged that America and Japan seize Vladivostok and as much as might be necessary of the Siberian Railroad in order to restore order and to save the immense stores of food and ammunition awaiting transportation to the former Russian battle-line from falling into the hands of the Germans, either through utter collapse of Russia or the treachery of the Bolsheviks. A few days later it was announced that Japan had sent a memorandum to the Allies suggesting that she should take the action outlined in General Foch's interview. At first it seemed probable that such an expedition would be sent into Siberia and that it might be international in its organization, American troops participating with Japanese in the occupation and policing of Vladivostok and the eastern portion of the Trans-Siberian Railroad, some suggestions even carrying the occupation as far westward as Lake Baikal. On March 4 it was definitely announced that Japan would occupy Vladivostok and its vicinity as a measure of protection to her own interests and those of her Allies, and on the fifth the French, British and Italian Ambassadors were reported as about to make a joint request upon Japan to take the necessary steps to safeguard Allied interests in Siberia. It was declared that no disposition existed on the part of the Allied nations to insist upon any form of guarantee by Japan, the action of Japan being held to be in effect an attempt to secure the position of their former ally against a former and a present enemy. The Russians apparently did not so regard it; a message, received on March 4 from John F. Stevens, head of the former American railway missions to Russia, then at Yokohama, Japan, reporting that there were rumors that the Russians were blowing up bridges along the line of the Trans-Siberian Railroad.

ON March 6 Washington announced that the American Government had not assented to Japan's armed occupation of Siberia and would not do so. It was said that the American Government could not consistently sanction, even by the rule of silence giving consent, the occupation of Russian territory by Japanese armed forces where the purpose could not be construed as intended to assist in winning the war against Germany. The attitude of President Wilson regarding intervention in Mexico was recalled; he having been willing to send troops to defend the honor of the nation and safeguard lives, but unwilling to invade the territory of any nation merely to protect investments.

On the seventh it was reported that informal verbal exchanges were being made at Tokyo between the American ambassador and the Japanese government. It was said that the American Government felt that, by whatever term of the diplomatic lexicon Japan's action might be called, it did not feel that conditions in Russia necessitated or justified the placing of Japanese troops on Russian soil. It is apparent that the American Government, which has been industriously furthering the growth of democratic ideals on Russia and the Central Empire, feared that all that had been gained for which was considered a definite vote of confidence in the Administration. Though only 35,000 women registered in the four districts, 90 8-10 per cent. of those registered cast their ballots, while only 33 7-10 per cent. of the men registered took the trouble to seek the polls. Some of the men were reported mands denied and with him leaving the conference room in a bad state of mind, suggesting that another strike might not be averted. The principal bone of contention appeared to be the policy adopted by the government to maintain the open shop in all shipyards, giving an equal opportunity to all labor, union and non-union, the Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board standing between labor and exploitation and insuring justice to all concerned. Mr. Hutcheson appeared to seek some special privileges for his own union which could have been granted only by granting equal powers to the other unions concerned. In this demand the other union officials refused to participate and the labor leader practically found himself a stranger in his own camp. Another strike was still possible.

The harbor of Vladivostok, whose stores of waiting goods Japan would protect democracy might be forfeited if Japanese troops entered former Russian territory; the very evident danger being that disorganized Russia from a former friend might, by the Japanese invasion, be transformed into a present enemy, which, even with her manpower disorganized as it is, would be a potent danger under the leadership of Germany. It was announced on March 5 that, if a Japanese expedition entered Siberia, the Chinese would send 20,000 troops into the former Russian territory simultaneously with the Japanese.

Lord Robert Cecil declared in London on March 8 that the German menace in Siberia was serious, and urged that Japanese intervention be not further delayed. He declared that German officers were already organizing former German prisoners of war in Siberia, and that certain elements of the Bolsheviks were in collusion with the Germans. Prince Lvoff of the former Kerensky Government was reported on March 10, as directing from Peking the organization of a Russian division to fight with the Japanese against the Bolsheviks. Other forces were being gathered in the Cossack country to cooperate.

A Week in the World's News

WOMEN BACK THE PRESIDENT. Special elections in four congressional districts in New York City on March 5 gave an opportunity for the exercise by the women of the newly conferred franchise and for an expression by all the people of the measure of their faith in the government. The result of the election was a sweeping victory for the four Democratic candidates, to have been led to the polls by their newly enfranchised spouses. The sidewalks near the polls were lined with baby buggies, which were looked after by women workers while the mothers marked their first ballot.

GAPING SEAMS DELAY LAUNCHINGS. The Emergency Fleet Corporation made it known on March 8 that wooden ship construction on the Pacific coast was being seriously delayed by lack of experienced calkers, 600 being needed and the union having been able to supply only 185. The contractors were ordered to secure men and machinery from every available source. The construction of 162 vessels, to be launched before December, 1918, was involved in delay.

TO FILL COAL BINS. In order to avoid as far as possible a recurrence next winter of the recent coal shortage, the Fuel Administration announced on March 8 that plans were being made to fill private bins during the spring and summer, but that no hoarding would be permitted. The retail price is to be reduced 30 cents on April 1st.

STILL SWINGS HIS HAMMER. Wm. L. Hutcheson, president of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, was, on March 6, reported as still in opposition to the President of the United States, the officials of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, Samuel Gompers, and the presidents of the seventeen other national and international unions concerned in the shipbuilding enterprise. It was reported that a final conference had on that date broken up with Mr. Hutcheson's de-

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND STRONG. The Provost Marshal General's office had ready early in March complete plans for the drafting of from 800,000 to 1,000,000 additional men during 1918. Definite announcement as to the numbers of men to be drawn and the dates upon which they were to report were held back pending the amendment of the selective draft act to provide that the draft shall be in proportion to the number of men qualified in class 1-A in each district, and that all men shall become liable to military service as they reach the age of twenty-one. About 80,000 men are still to be called under the first draft.

PICKETING WAS LAWFUL. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia on March 4 decided that the picketing of the White House by the militant suffrage members of the National Woman's Party was not in itself unlawful. The conviction of the pickets in the District of Columbia police court was reversed. Suits for damages against the present and former wardens of the District of Columbia workhouse aggregating $400,000 had already been brought by eight of the women imprisoned for picketing, and it was said that 218 others were in line to press their claims if they so desired.

HOME RULE LOSES CHIEF. John E. Redmond, successor of Parnell in the leadership of the Irish Home Rule movement, died March 6 after a surgical operation. Mr. Redmond's entry into public life was through an humble clerkship, and he was elected to parliament at the age of 25, taking the oath on February 2, 1881. From the outset he waged a fiery parliamentary fight against the opponents of Home Rule on the one side and the advocates of revolution on the other. While other leaders were trying to persuade the Irish people to take advantage of England's war troubles to gain their ends, he persisted in his parliamentary struggle for self-government, and exhorted the Irish to loyalty, calling on the young men from the recruiting platform. Mr. Redmond was a man of education and culture, and

Christ's Future Earthly Reign

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I
AMONG the questions raised by the previous articles on prophecy was one as to whether there would be a second incarnation of Christ. On the supposition that He is to reign on the earth, it was supposed that He must be in the flesh as a man.

He is indeed to reign over the earth, but this does not make it necessary that He shall reign on the earth. The article on the Millennium in the issue of December 5 referred to this. That "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives" (Zech. 14:4), we accept literally; but it does not necessarily carry with it the thought that He shall remain there, or in any other earthly locality, throughout the millennial reign. Indeed, the touching of the mountain with His feet is the signal for its division into two halves and the formation of a great valley in between. As the prophet Nahum says, "The mountains quake at Him, and the hills melt; and the earth is upheaved at His presence, yea, the world and all that dwell therein" (1:5).

But as to a second incarnation, this is unnecessary and of course impossible, except in the sense that all things with God are possible. In His resurrection body, Christ could be present or vanish in an instant. He could ascend up into heaven or remain upon the earth at His will. It is in this body that He now appears in the presence of God for us (Hebrews 9:24), and it is in this body that we may look for Him to come again, as He was seen to go (Acts 1:11).

Indeed, there is danger in pressing the thought of a reincarnation of Christ, for such is the teaching of many of the false religions now being imported from the east, like Buddhism and Theosophy and the Order of the Star of the East. They believe that a great teacher will soon appear in the world, and they would have Christians suppose that he is our Saviour. But such is not true, for the Christ they speak of is not the one revealed in the Bible. Their Christ is named in the same breath with Buddha and Confucius and Zoroaster and other leaders of Pagan cults. They make no mention of sin, of sacrificial atonement, of judgment, of the Holy Spirit. They are simply preparing the way for the Antichrist, and we need to be on our guard against them.

II

AN interesting letter was received from a correspondent who took the position that the Transfiguration of Christ (Matt. 17) was His coming in His kingdom in miniature, and we think the position was well taken. Quoting from the present writer's "Prophecy and the Lord's Return":

"When He comes the second time, He will appear on the earth and yet He will be apart from the earth in the air, and here (in the Transfiguration) we see Him in that relationship to both. When He comes the second time, it will be in glory, and here we see His face shining 'as the sun,' His raiment 'white as the light.' When He comes the second time, the dead saints will be with Him, and here we see Moses, representing that resurrection, talking with Him. When He comes the second time, the saints who are alive and remain on the earth shall be caught up in the clouds to meet Him 'in the air,' and here we see Elijah, representing that translation, also talking with Him. When He comes the second time, Israel in the flesh will sustain a mediatorial relationship to Him, and the glorified Church on behalf of the Gentile nations; and here we see Peter, James and John, representing Israel in the flesh, occupying this place of wonderful privilege and fellowship. Thus appears the whole story of the second coming in a kind of picture, and yet it is all real. No wonder that it brought so much encouragement to the disappointed and wondering disciples."

"THE disciples were called Christians first at Antioch," and that name that is above every other name, "Christian," is the name to which the followers of Christ adhere and will ever show their allegiance. All other names are subsidiary to this one, and it is the name exalted above all others.

There has been a tendency fortunately lessening of late years to substitute the lesser names of religious bodies for the supreme name of the Founder of the Christian religion; but there is evidence that the great world-war is intensifying the already growing sentiment of brotherhood in the various churches.

Those who enter into the fraternity of warfare for the good of humanity, and march under the banners of civilization, of right and justice, those who touch the heart and hand, and meet and are inspired by a common devotion, cannot fail to have their fellow-feeling made manifest in the closer ties of religious understanding and sentiment. Thus will prejudice and passion pass more quickly from religion, and the world will say, "Behold how good and pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." And the name "Christian" will connote all that the

That the correspondent was not in error in thus conceiving of the Transfiguration is made sure by the words of one of the witnesses on that occasion: Read for example, Peter's testimony in his second epistle where he says (1:16-18):

"We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of his majesty."

"For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

"And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount."

Here we have not only Peter's testimony to the fact, but his inspired comment upon the testimony. The transfiguration, he says, was "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Not that it was exhaustive of His power in that direction, nor that it meant His coming in its entirety; but as a foregleam of that momentous event in its various particulars, it established its certainty as something that is to be.

III

AND yet all this testimony is not satisfying to some. Another correspondent wrote, "We do not understand at all from Scripture that the people, whom God is now calling out from all the nations for His Name, are to reign with Him over the millennial earth." And then he states the grounds of his objection. It will be interesting and instructive to consider them:

(1) He says: "There is to be no millennial earth here. The only place in the Bible that speaks of a thousand year reign is Revelation 20:4, and it does not at all indicate that it is to take place here on this earth."

Where, then, is it to take place, may we ask? The preceding chapter, to which this one bears the closest relationship, is speaking of the earth. There are the kings of the earth and their armies gathered together to make war against our Lord Jesus Christ, and there is He seen smiting the nations and ruling them with a rod of iron. Immediately following the account of the thousand years' reign, we are told that Satan, loosed from his prison-house, goes out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth. "And they went up on the breadth of the earth and compassed the camp of the saints about the beloved city." It is not until after this that the earth and the heaven flee away.

Perhaps this correspondent had not seen the article on "The Millennium: When, What and Where?" when he wrote thus. Therein it was stated that, while the thousand years specifically is named but once in the Bible, yet the period to which that phrase refers is named again and again, and we quoted Moses, David, Isaiah, Amos, Peter, Paul, John and Jesus Christ. Indeed, as Nathaniel West says: "There is a text in what is known among scholars as the 'little apocalypse of Isaiah' (24:21-23) which so closely resembles Revelation 20:1-4 as to be called its companion piece."

(2) The correspondent quotes Revelation 20:4 which reads: "And I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus. . . which had not worshipped the beast. . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." And then he adds, "This certainly does not include us of the present time. We have not been beheaded, and are not likely to be. In other words, we are not martyrs for Christ, and it seems presumptuous to put ourselves in the company of these martyrs for this special reign."

We who are caught up at the coming of the Lord will be in the general reign with Christ, but not in this special reign."

That he is not very clear as to this "special reign" is evident from a later statement in which he says that it is a reign "with His martyrs somewhere else than on this earth, and that it is now taking place."

There are two errors here. In the first place, Christ, considered as to His human nature, Christ the God-man, is not now reigning anywhere. As God, He is reigning over the universe, of course, just as He has done ever since He created it; but as the risen and glorified man He is "sat down on the right hand of God, from henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool" (Heb. 10:12, 13). In that day, however, i.e., when His enemies are made his footstool, He will come again, "and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever" (Luke 1:32, 33).

In the second place, the reign of the martyrs can not now be taking place, because the martyrs themselves have not yet been martyred. They are the martyrs of the tribulation period which is yet to come, and in which they will suffer at the hands of the Antichrist (see Revelation 13:15-18).

And finally, it is no presumption for us "to put ourselves in the company of these martyrs," because the context itself does that for us. For example, it says that "This is the first resurrection," and good exegesis makes this harmonize with "the resurrection of the just" (Luke 14:14), and "the resurrection of life" (John 5:29). All believers are counted in these resurrections, and necessarily in that.

But why are the martyrs singled out? For a very good reason indeed. Up until this time, the Church had been in the air with Christ, and was now about to enter with Him upon His earthly reign. Meanwhile Antichrist had been reigning on the earth, and these martyrs had refused to acknowledge him and had paid for their loyalty with their life. But now he is tormented and they are comforted. He is bound and cast into the bottomless pit for a thousand years, and they are raised from the dead and exalted to a place with the Church, which is Christ's body, and they reign with Christ a thousand years.

IV

IN the foregoing it has been assumed that, when Christ comes in the air and the Church is caught up to meet Him there, it is from that location that He and His Bride shall reign over the earth.

Such is a common understanding among premillennialists, but it is not by any means the only one. For example, Luthardt, a distinguished German commentator, says unhesitatingly, "The Church does not remain in the air, nor is she retired into heaven, but, after her translation, accompanies the Bridegroom hitherward to the Holy Place," by which he means some glorified place on the earth in which she shall be separated from the as yet unglorified part of humanity. Dr. Nathaniel West agrees with this, and warns us not to "rob corporeity of its rights in the resurrection, or dissolve under the idea of 'glorification' the resurrection body into a gauzy texture ballooning in the sky."

There is not space to amplify on this, but should the interest warrant, it will be a pleasure to do so at some later date. It would seem that they who hold this view confuse features of the life of the Church in the millennial age with some that shall maintain in the eternal age to follow; but further study and meditation on our part might remove this difficulty.

Purified as by Fire

name Christ signifies to the separated bodies of believers, who are yet one in the fundamentals of the faith of the Gospel.

The churches, inspired by a common purpose and supported by common ideals, are working now among the soldiers in the different camps, and will continue to unite their efforts for the baffling of the forces of sin that seek to flout their banners in the face of the nation. The churches seeking to do the work of their Master as he would have them do it, with respect to the enhancement of human experience through the contributions of religion, will find in this work a common basis for devotion, and for benevolence, and for service, that will exalt all those who engage in it.

Hence, out of the war the American churches may be expected to come with a more settled determination to "know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified."

They will come to feel that those who have entered into the work of arms for the service of the human race have shared the sorrows and met the approval of the One who came into the world in order to defeat the wiles of the devil and to deliver men from the shackles of sin.

Hence the churches will be brought much closer in the ties of their idealism and devotion, as they partake of the bread of affliction and the wine of sorrow. They will feel that the one true devotion is that which inspired the Saviour of men in his infinite service and sacrifice for the uplift of the human race. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," were his words.

And through the pains of betrayal, and through the suffering of Golgotha, or through the loneliness of Gethsemane, Christendom has been drawn closer to the effectual sacrifice. And this shall be the tie that shall prevail over all men in the realm of faith.

The faith of the future will be an intense and quickening faith that has been forged in the fires of affliction, and it will be precious to all true believers.

The Runner in the Race

A SERMON BY REV. O. H. PANCKOKE, D.D.*

TEXT—1 Cor. 9: 24. "So run that ye may obtain."

PAUL has in mind the picture of a foot-race. It is a superb spectacle to see the athletes strain every muscle, each trying to reach the goal first. They have trained long and hard for the day and are fit for the task.

But here is one in marked contrast to the others. He is trying, but his efforts are ineffective. He is not in condition. His muscles are flabby; his breath comes in gasps. Half-way down the course he must stop. What a sorry spectacle! What a lack of manliness!

Here's another. He appears in perfect condition, but his efforts are listless. His eyes are dull. One passes him and he makes no effort to regain the lead. We wonder what may be in that head of his. Perhaps there is excuse for his listlessness; he deserves our sympathy. But he goes down to defeat. He is one of that countless number that have gone down to defeat. "So run that ye may obtain."

My friend, how are you running your race for Jesus? Are you unfit for the race, untrained, weakened, so that you are a sorry spectacle beside the strong and able? "So run that ye may obtain." We are unfitted in the race for Jesus, if we permit our passions to sap our spiritual manhood. When I speak of passions, I don't mean the coarse, the big passions that burn out character and soul and leave men like an oak that has been struck by lightning and which stands charred and torn, a black specter reaching up into the sky. No running for Jesus when such devastation has gone about!

There are little passions more insidious through their very smallness, little passions which men think they can play with until they are mastered. The little vanity, the petty selfishness, the occasional self-indulgence, the little grain of worldliness, the little touch of temper. Their name is legion. They are like a web of gossamer thread that binds men down and stunts their effort when they ought to be up and doing.

IT is said that when Gulliver came into the land of Lilliput, the little people could not find ropes strong enough, to bind what they thought a monstrous giant. While he was asleep they staked down every single hair. He was just as effectively bound as though loaded down with chains of iron. Some people are bound by ropes of sin. Others are bound by the gossamer threads of little passions. But they are bound firm and fast. When God's word dings in their ears, "So run that ye may obtain," they find they are bound.

How pitifully small looks the athlete who cannot refrain from strong drink and heavy food and thus loses the race! Well doth Paul say: "They abstain for the sake of a corruptible crown." You are a Christian athlete, running for an incorruptible crown which was bought with the precious blood of Jesus. God is watching you. Jesus is calling to you: "He that would follow me, let him deny himself." Before your eyes is the splendid example of the apostles and the illustrious company of Christians who overcame their passions, small and great, in order that they might be followers of the Lamb.

Has it ever struck you how serious a thing Christianity is, how many failures come about because men are playing at Christianity? How plain it is that the athlete cannot indulge himself in food and drink and at the same time hope to win. Jesus says: "He that puts his hand to the plow and looks back is not worthy of the Kingdom of God." That is the make-believe Christianity, which has become a habit, but has no depth; which believes it can combine the service of God and loyalty to Jesus with indulgence of self.

You are serious, my friend. But the little passions come again and again. At times you feel happy that the combat is won. You are not tempted; there is calm. You are confident your enemy is in your power. Lo! when you least expect it, he rises on you again; again you are the slave. He comes like the rise and fall of the tide. It recedes, leaves bare, large wastes of sand. Children build castles and fortresses on it, perchance with the thought that the ocean will be kept back. But the ocean returns and washes away all their puny little efforts. So it goes with all our little passions. They recede. We rejoice that we have conquered. But they come back again and wash away and engulf all our hopes. And at times they rise, whipped along by the storm, and make deep inroads. We stand aghast!

What are you going to do, my friend? You're going to quit in despair? Back into the race, my friend! "So run that ye may obtain." Stumble along the road, your path marked out by the Lord, even if you can't do any more than stumble along.

TRADITION tells that during the persecution of Christians under Nero, Peter was prevailed upon to flee and save himself. On the Appian Way he met the Lord. In surprise, he asked: "Lord, whither art thou going?" The Lord answered: "Back to Rome to be crucified again, because my apostle lost courage." And Peter returned to be crucified.

If you are going to quit, my friend, remember Peter and the Lord on the Appian way. Back to your post!

You're going to quit the race because you cannot overcome? Jesus is by your side. When Emperor Constantine was faced by the enemy he is said to have had a dream. The sign of the cross appeared in the sky. Below it was written: "In this sign thou shalt conquer." Our many foibles and earth-born desires are the army of the enemy. The sign of the cross is held on high. In that sign we shall conquer. Nay, Jesus shall conquer for us. Jesus does not give advice. He does things. He came not to show salvation. He came to establish salvation by the ransom of his blood. On in the race, my friend, though the eye become dim, though the heart pound in the breast as though it would break. Look not aside. Look up to Jesus; from him will come strength. In your very weakness his grace is made perfect. We run a poor race for the Lord, if we permit our disappointments and failures to make us faint that we stop in despair. "So run that ye may obtain."

Here is another man in the race. He seems fit and in condition, but there is no life in his efforts, no spring to his movements. He is listless. He is passed by others, but does not seem to try to hold his place.

Shall we call him a quitter, or is there some reason that holds him back and takes away his courage? You are that runner if you permit your disappointments and little achievements to stunt your efforts for the future. There are hardships in our life. Perhaps they are so heavy that they make us stop short in our way—a deed that leaves us spent and despairing, without hope of ever getting away from it; a shadow that remains in our life, haunting us and marring every effort, depressing us with its somber hue.

PERHAPS they are small and irritating in their very insistence. You know how a little grain of sand placed under the eyelid will irritate and result in blindness unless it is removed. So these are little failures in our Christian efforts, little disappointments in our Christian hopes and achievements, little backslidings in our Christian conduct. It begins to rub on our soul until the soul is sore and tired. A lifeless listlessness comes over our actions. We run indifferently. We try no more. Perchance we quit.

Back to the course, my friend! So run that ye may win the crown. You are a quitter if you turn aside. God hates a quitter. What glory is there in winning a race without competition, without difficulty? What glory is there if we obtain the crown by being carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease?

Under your eyelid, the grain of sand will make a festering sore. Place that same grain in the shell of an oyster and lo! that unseemly grain becomes a precious pearl. Turn your difficulties into pearls of achievement. That is a noble faith which makes of every obstacle and disappointment a stepping-stone to greater courage, an incentive to purer achievement.

How pitiful it is when the disappointments and failures in our Christianity dwarf men and make them small, when God has given them the quality to be big. Bigness or smallness is a matter of character, and not of position. I have found big men and women in worn clothing and in sod huts. I have found pitifully small men and women in high positions, surrounded by all comforts; small through their very selfishness and vanity. How sorry a thing it is, my friend, when those whom God has gifted to be great in his kingdom, to be leaders and guides to others, are dwarfed by their disappointments and become listless and perchance stop. Instead of leading the army of Christ, they are only sorry stragglers.

Back to your task, my friend! Strain every muscle. So run that ye may obtain the crown, the courage of victory flushing your cheek and sending the blood coursing through your veins! Jesus is by your side. The disciples sailed over the Lake of Galilee without the Saviour. The storm arose. They were sore afraid. Jesus walked on the sea, and banished their fear: "Peace, be still, it is I." Then Peter called: "Bid me come to thee," and Jesus said: "Come." He walked safely on the troubled sea. On the other side of the tossing sea of life with its many failures, Jesus is standing. When courage runs low, he calls to us, "Peace, be still, it is I." When hope goes low, call to him: "Lord, bid me come to thee," and He will answer, "Come." And you will stand safely on the waves that filled you with fear. "So run that ye may obtain." Do it for Jesus' sake. Do it with Jesus' help, and your victory is assured.

Led by Her Faith

THE dwellers of the tenement filed slowly out and stood ten deep lining the walk from the narrow doorway to a white hearse waiting at the curb. These poor, with due regard for the proprieties, spoke in hushed tones or stood silent.

From out the dim mouth of the tenement came hackmen, each bearing an armful of flowers, mostly in the form of wreaths and crosses. The crosses indicated a Christian funeral, though the tenement was overwhelmingly Yiddish. Then came the clergyman, bareheaded, and after him a small white, satin-covered casket, bearing within it a jewel that would shine and sparkle no more in the gloom of New York's East Side. The family followed, the father, hard-faced, smitten, hopeless; the mother, closed-veiled and sobbing quietly.

The waiting crowd showed more deference than usual. It is customary at such times to make verbal as well as mental appraisement of the probable cost of the funeral, to contrast the elegance of the casket with the neighborhood's last burial, to take careful count of the coaches filled with flowers, and to note the number of carriages. For the tenement believes in scattering money like a spendthrift when it buries its dead. The sharp tongue of criticism that scores frugality on such occasions piles up a heavy burden for the mourning poor. But no spoken comment was made by the sympathizing onlookers.

Although the stricken family lived in the tenement, they were not of it. The coaches were numerous and two open hacks were completely filled with flowers. But no order was given for the usual parade around the block. This is a satisfying concession presumably for the benefit of the neighborhood, more especially when the carriages are numerous and the floral display elaborate.

The rain was falling gently as the last coach door clicked shut and the procession began its journey to the silent city. The bystanders dispersed quietly. The eyes of some were red with weeping, for all the tenement knew that what it loved best had gone.

Lily had died on her fourth birthday. Her going was no surprise, for she had been sick for weeks, but it was a shock. Enoch, the Scriptures tell us, "walked with God." Lily walked with Christ. She knew him, she talked with him, she told her mother how in her dreams he was so often with her. Jesus was as real to Lily as a playmate. On the last morning upon which her eyes opened, she beckoned her mother to her and whispered, "He is coming for me today." And sure enough, before evening he came. The tenement did not believe in Christ, but it believed in Lily. Lily's happy face had brightened the dark halls, her laughter had rung out as she climbed the crooked stairs to the fourth floor front. The neighbors felt more lenient toward Christ because Lily spoke so rapturously of him.

No student of the occult will ever tell us how often the thoughts of the living visit the deserted cities of the dead. The name may long since have grown dim upon the stone, youth may have given place to tottering age, but still men's hearts will worship at the shrine where lies the sacred dust. Happy are they if they have heard Christ's word of another and continuing city; if they have caught the significance of that declaration, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

Every Sunday found Lily's father sitting by her grave. Neither rain nor snow nor storm could stop him. His little four-year-old daughter, who had climbed every night into his lap, had found her way deep down into his heart. Often as she had sat upon his knee her sweet-faced mother would hear her evening prayer. The father listened but said nothing. He had no faith in his wife's God nor in Lily's Christ. The cold mold of Greenwood encompassed all his treasure.

One blustery Sunday night in autumn the father came home late from his vigil. "Anne," said he abruptly, "Lily gave me a message for you today." "Yes, William," said his wife quietly, laying down a photograph of Lily that she was holding. "She asked," continued the father, a tremor of resentment in his voice, "Why does my mother never come to visit me?" "No, William," said the mother sadly, "my little Lily never sent me such a message. My Lily does not lie in Greenwood. I know where Lily is."

The father stared but was silent. That night the mother opened her Bible and read aloud—something she had not done since Lily died. When she had finished reading, "In my Father's house are many mansions," and began to pray, two heads were bowed.

The Malady of Not Wanting

SUNDAY, March 24. Luke 6:25. "Woe unto you that are full." Some of our Saviour's severest words were spoken to just this sort of people. The people had no sense of want. They were fully contented. Their journey was ended, and they had arrived at their goal. There was nothing alluring them which was still beyond their reach. There was no urging hunger for the beyond. Desire was dead. They were full! When they looked upon the Master they had no vision of untraversed worlds. There was no beauty that they should desire Him. They saw nothing they wanted. Now people of this kind were the gravest problems with which our Lord had to deal. He could light the smouldering lamp of a poor publican who, in his dejection, would not so much as lift his eyes to heaven. And he could recover some poor woman who was a sinner, and who stood before Him in aching silence. But who can pour wine into a full cup? Who can place treasure in a locked hand? Who can teach those who know everything? Who can save the righteous? "Woe unto you that are full!"

"The ill of all ills is the lack of desire." So sings Faber, and we can test ourselves whether or not that greatest ill is lodged in our own life. All we have to do is to get into the presence of Jesus Christ. Have we any sense of want when we stand before Him? Have we any sharp conviction of poverty? Is there anything in our souls which resembles the stricken feeling of utter crudeness which afflicts some amateur artist when he brings his own works among the finished works of a great master? Is there any height, or depth, or breadth which stagger us in their range? Is there any holiness glistening far above us like virgin snow on Alpine heights? Is there any love, stronger than sin, or death, or hell? Is there any grace, invincible as granite, and yet tender as the violet that nestles in a cleft of the granite? When we stand before our Saviour have we any sense of awful want? Have we any vision of unsearchable riches? Or are we full, and we want none of it? Do we say, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up! Take thine ease?" Then our satisfaction is the ominous sign of spiritual death. Woe unto you that are full.

"Blessed are ye that hunger now!" But suppose we do not hunger, and we know we do not? Well, we can take sides against ourselves. We can set our wills against our own desireless hearts. We can force ourselves upon our knees in the presence of the Lord whose grace and beauty we do not crave. We can tell Him we have no fire in our grate, and we know it, and that the pity is we have scarcely any desire for it. And we can say to Him, "Thou seest how great is my need of Thee!" We can present our desireless hearts for His recreating grace. And what will happen? "In the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert." And some day, and perhaps very soon, the desireless heart which is thus offered to the Lord shall break out in singing, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon the earth that I desire beside Thee." J. H. J.

Bodies Mortal and Immortal

MONDAY, March 25. I Cor. 15:44. "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." Some day we shall have to lay these bodies of ours aside, just as we lay aside worn-out garments. We shall have to move out of these earthly tabernacles, just as we have to vacate old houses. Our bodies are mortal. The word "mortal" is a truer translation of the apostle's thought than the word "vile" in the well-known text, "Who shall change our vile bodies." Our bodies are not vile unless we make them so. But they are mortal, because they are material. They are death-doomed. "Earth to earth and dust to dust." But the spirit, ah, the spirit, what becomes of that? It returns unto the God who gave it. Yes, but how? Disembodied, or clothed again in another body? To answer this question Paul wrote this wonderful chapter. He says we have two bodies, two kinds of bodies. Lest our faith fail he expresses the same thought in several different terms. He speaks of death as being unclothed, and of something which takes place the moment after death as being "clothed upon." No sooner does the spirit leave this body than it takes up another.

Are we anxious to know what sort of a house we are going to move into, when we move out of this mortal body? This much is clear: our spiritual bodies are to be invisible to those who still live in the flesh. They will resemble the body which Christ wore after his resurrection—not subject to the ordinary laws which limit earthly bodies; possessing new faculties of which we can have now but faint conception. If Jesus' resurrection body be the type of ours when we shall lay aside mortality, we shall be satisfied. C. C. A.

The Shepherd of the Sheep

TUESDAY, March 26. Heb. 13:20, 21. "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ." Giving his life for the sheep was one of the tasks of the Good Shepherd which Jesus had set for himself. His return from the dead is also for a pastoral purpose: the sheep would have scattered, if he had not come back to them and rallied them around him with words of cheer and hope. In the risen Lord God is to wayward men the God of peace. He is reconciled to them through the blood of that everlasting covenant of redemption which He established soon after the fall. He loves Jesus' sheep for Jesus' sake; therefore He restored the Shepherd to them after a few painful hours of separation. The Shepherd's return, moreover, brings with it the promise of great things which the sheep, the believers, shall accomplish through Jesus Christ. The same wonderful power which brought their Shepherd out of his grave is to be manifested in them and by them in every imaginable good work. With Christ, their risen Redeemer, Christians are to walk in a newness of life. They are to throw off every influence that enfeebles and deadens the activities of their soul. Continually reviewing, with a grateful heart, the glorious meaning of their Lord's Easter victory, they will be inspired with a love of God and his kingdom of righteousness such as they had not before. W. H. T. D.

Inseparable from His Spirit

WEDNESDAY, March 27. Ps. 139:7. "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence?" The ideal of Buddhism is an idol, sitting cross-legged, solemn, silent, negative, the image of dead desire. Hundreds of millions vainly seek rest and peace beside a feelingless figure of stone. The Christian's God is eternally alive, infinitely able to supply all human need. What a transition from a lifeless stone to the bosom of infinite compassion and affection! It is like the mighty change from a prison to a palace.

What a boon to know that your God is of infinite power in holiness, goodness, perfection of love, peace and happiness; to know that He is omnipresent, everywhere waiting for your coming, preparing for your pleasure and usefulness, embellishing His worlds for your research, creating riches to make you munificent!

Only the infinite personality of the most high God meets all the requirements of an immortal spirit. Mysterious and vast in His greatness, yet "Closer is He than breathing, nearer than hands and feet."

The soul of God and the soul of man are united as the only real powers and loving union with the angels in the wide universe of creation. All other forces are controlled by this Divine and human partnership. E. W. C.

Bringing Immortality to Light

THURSDAY, March 28. II Tim. 1:10. "Jesus Christ, . . . who hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." It is one of the great features of the spiritual dynamics of Christianity that the Gospel places a firm belief in a future life among the guiding principles of our religion. There is no spur to virtue, no incentive to perseverance in righteousness, no moral uplift, no freedom from the lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh and the pride of life to be compared with that which comes from a firm belief in individual immortality.

We are living now, this is sure. We shall not be living here long. This also is certain. But we shall keep on living just the same. Are we sure of this? Christ was, and His vision took in the whole circle of life. Thus we see it. There is an Eye which from the throne of the universe sees the whole circle of the earth. God sees life as a whole. Christ saw it thus, and He spoke with absolute certainty of the life to come. There are many abiding-places in our Father's house. The universe is His house. Each world is a separate mansion, and each mansion has many chambers. The child of God, when he moves out of this mansion, enters another more beautiful and great. We shall take with us only so much wealth as we have amassed, measured by standards of eternal value. Love will last. Generosity will last. Truth will last. Honor will last. Fidelity will last. These spirits of ours will last, for Christ hath abolished death. C. C. A.

Death Disarmed

FRIDAY, March 29. I Cor. 15:55-57. "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." With this defiant apostrophe and jubilant exclamation Paul concludes his presentation of the doctrine which had become controverted in Corinth, that of the resurrection of the dead. He has related it to Jesus. The entire life-work of Jesus has been crowned with glory by his own resurrection. That work was performed for our sake, in our stead. He has fulfilled the law for us; therefore we need not fear its accusations. He has wiped out our sin by his immaculate life and his holy death; therefore our guilt has been removed. He has robbed death of its power by rising again on the third day; therefore we need not dread this last enemy that must be overcome by us. Death has been completely disarmed to everyone who grasps the significance of Christ's living and dying. Death can harm men only because of their sin; for it is the wages of sin. Sin can be argued against men only on the basis of the divine law which they have broken. Death is the terrible conclusion that follows from these fatal premises, sin and the law. If the premises have been canceled, the conclusion is impossible. W. H. T. D.

Triumph Over Death

SATURDAY, March 30. John 11:25. "I am the resurrection and the life." No one doubts death. Death is as certain as life, yea, it is the apparent conqueror of life. No mortal returns to tell of the world beyond death. Every explorer's lips are sealed except One, who is the Author of life and the Victor over death. He changed the name of death, calling it "going away," "an exodus," "a coming for you."

Paul calls death "a departure"; a putting off of a worn-out tabernacle that the occupant may enter his mansion. Death here is abolished; life lives. Death unclothes that we may be clothed upon with immortal vesture. Death becomes a messenger conducting the soul into its new apartment of celestial splendors. He helps the corruptible to put on incorruption; he gears the wheels of life into the eternal movement. "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory?"

Because Christ is risen, we shall rise with Him; the angels of light encircling the tomb of Jesus proclaimed a risen Redeemer, that the world might be filled with the joy of hope.

Jesus commissioned a woman to tell the first story of His resurrection, while He ascended to prepare a place in His Father's house or all the redeemed. To doubt Christ's Word is to doubt Him. To everyone that believeth, He is the life-giving Saviour. What time the heart is troubled, it trusts and rejoices, believing that He will one day take us where we shall hunger and thirst no more, where tears never fall and sorrows never come, where the Lamb of God shall feed and lead them unto the living fountains of water. These wonderful words should deliver every heart from the bondage of the fear of death. We should behold the glorified Christ in our thoughts, coming from His entombment, traveling in the greatness of His strength, mighty to save.

"He giveth His beloved sleep," that we may have a beautiful awakening, see Him as He is and feel forever safe and satisfied. E. W. C.

The White Loaves of Samara

By MAYNARD
OWEN WILLIAMS

Passed by the Russian Censor

Tiflis, capital of the Russian Caucasus, where Williams is now at work

SAMARA, on the Volga, which is the Mississippi of Russia, is an American city of the Kansas-Nebraska type, overlaid with a set of signs that look like a bilingual in the Latin and Greek alphabets, with a few extras added to confuse the unwary traveller. "HOMEPA" is perfectly good English, especially if you see it, as I first did, in the two parts HOME and PA. But the Russian, analphabetic as he is, chooses to pronounce this word, which means hotel, as though it were spelled NOMERA. But when the well-intentioned Russian names a theatre for unspoken drama with the suggestive title "Sphinx," he starts it with a "C" and wanders outside the entire Latin alphabet, in order to convey his meaning.

The stores of Samara, its streets, its women and its street cars the size of a piano box,—if one met them in Alliance, Nebraska, where I spent a week one afternoon between trains, he would proudly stamp them with a "Made in the U. S. A." label and speak of them with his thumbs thrust into the armholes of his vest.

Samara lacks nothing to make it American except a common language and an alphabet which a Frenchman, Englishman, Filipino or Swede could understand. The sporting goods stores wear the same grim aspect that used to delight the American Nimrod in the good old days when shooting was a pastime rather than a duty, and the kodak store sells talking machines, post-cards and picture-molding in the manner so well known along the Mississippi. An ice-cream soda fountain would complete the picture, but the Russian sees so much ice in eight months of winter that he takes a vacation from it the rest of the year.

Samara is 900 miles by river from the Caspian and 1,100 from the limit of navigation on the Volga at Tver. It is the hub from which three spokes of iron radiate to Siberia, Turkestan and West Russia. Fermented mare's milk has done for Samara what denatured food has done for Battle Creek, and here one can discuss symptoms ad infinitum.

THIS thriving trade center has a grain elevator that looks like a city hall and a city hall that looks like a barn. Architecturally, it owes much to the trees that hide it from the river, and it is only here and there that a structure whose massive stone work was only too evidently laid on with a trowel or poured into a form, sticks out like a sore thumb. It has the usual number of Greek Orthodox churches with bulbous domes, and a Polish

Catholic cathedral whose angular lines remind one of the living skeleton talking to the fat lady.

There is a city park surrounded by a fence and a row of boot-blacks and containing a statue of Alexander the Second, who, since he had a monument erected to him, must have been a Czar. This monument is the finest thing in Samara, and the best I have seen yet in Russia. At one corner of the group there is a whiskered peasant, typifying the first step these admirable heroes of Tolstoian literature took from serfdom to become anarchist hoarders of grain. A second corner shows a Circassian officer with a fine straight nose and his toilet set stuck into the ear-ridge pockets of his beautifully tailored teherkeska. He is shown breaking his sword over his knee in recognition of the fact that the Caucasus was once conquered by Russia.

A THIRD figure is that of Asia, casting aside her veil in order to see more clearly this slow-moving master who has penetrated with his armies to the heart of Central Asia. The last is an emancipated Balkan woman, a Bulgarian perhaps, freed from the Turk in 1877-78 to gain strength to fight him in 1912 and ally herself with him in 1915. All in all, it is a really fine monument, with Alexander the center of interest, as a reminder to the Russians in 1917 that a Czar had his uses, even if he was a tyrant, for Russia just now is not in a conquering mood.

We slid down to Samara on the bosom of "little mother Volga" in two fine steamers, with a break of journey at Kazan. A night train carried us from Moscow to the fair city of Nizhni-Novgorod, where we put up in a summer hotel and a winter climate.

Nizhni is a delight to the eye, with several churches piercing the sky-line and a half a dozen cobbled roads piercing the grassy slopes in order to carry goods and passengers from the lower town beside the Volga to the upper town, where the upper classes live. The Oka joins the Volga at this point, to the vast improvement of both, and the harbor is alive with shipping.

THE great fair at Nizhni is an annual exposition which is visited annually by half a million people, for each of whom there is half a thousand roubles' worth of goods of all sorts, if he cares to buy. There are eight thousand booths and shops and the annual turnover usually amounts to a hundred million dollars. But just at present, not one shop in fifty is open and the goods displayed are shoddy and cheap.

The Nizhni fair has continued for a century and the traffic in furs, cotton and hides has grown to enormous proportions. The goods are not sold by sample but are all brought in to the fair, which failed this year not so much for a lack of buyers as for a lack of materials. I spoke a few words with some Chinese women who had come all the way from Hankow, China, so one can see that this vast concourse of buyers and sellers from Kamchatka to Arabia is not a county affair, with horse races as a drawing card.

In one of the booths in the main building, where flashlights, cigar lighters, cheap razors, ordinary and safety, and other knick-knacks were on sale, we exchanged a few words with a Russian girl who had lived in Boston for several years. She is the only returned Russian I have met yet whose dialect is not that of Manhattan Island. She was doing well in Boston, but she developed a longing to see the home folks and the old country and now she is behind a counter at the Nizhni fair in a bad year.

I ADMIRE the authorities for having discovered a way of making galvanized iron roofs anything but ugly. As one looks down on the fair from the heights of Nizhni, the long, regular lines of shops with painted iron roofs form a sea of soft green in the midst of which a glittering white church shows its stately dome. A little nearer the Volga, there is a great Russian church with cream-colored walls, a green roof and silver domes that is simply too good to be true, even in the land where magnificent churches are the national skyscrapers.

Two elevators carry passengers from the riverside to the heights and one of them pierces the mottled wall of the fine old Kremlin and lands the traveler in a lovely park, from which one can see the sun set behind the river and the silver-tipped structure of cream and gold which dominates the view beyond. To the right, across the Volga, the vast plain of Russia stretches away to the horizon, a lovely but melancholy landscape studded with bulging haystacks and jeweled with beautiful churches with bulging domes. Bulk is the impressive thing in Russia, even during a war. The coat-of-arms of the New Russia should contain a cornucopia in a conspicuous place, for even when one eats black bread in real Russia, it seems as though the supply were boundless.

FROM Nizhni the Professor, the Interpreter and I went out to the little industrial city of Sornova, a homely village which has squatted down around a very businesslike group of factories where twenty-five hundred men are employed. A chuggy little boat carried us at just the proper speed up the Volga for four miles, at a cost of eight cents.

Sornova has several town wells, with a bucket on one end of the rope and a log of wood on the other to balance the bucket. Some day, a bright man with ideas will change the log of wood for another bucket and make the thing work vice versa instead of single track. The log houses are neat, with flowers in most of the windows and curtains that convey every impression of an intimate acquaintance with the wash-tub. We had our lunch at a little inn where the lower floor was filled with laborers and soldiers and the upper floor was reserved for those who knew that a table cloth was neither a receptacle for sunflower shucks nor a polishing rag for high boots.

The three of us ordered two portions of borssch. The Professor, who was hungry, thought three portions would be necessary and it was only my veto on that amount that prevented them from serving it in the tank of the village fire-engine. We had to leave some of the food as it was, which is a sufficiently rare occurrence in Russia to be worthy of mention. The waiter was a big, brawny fellow who had the body of a farmer and the whiskers of an English butler.

The main street of Sornova used to be a fine broad patch of land, which was alternately a dust-bin for the village hens and a swimming bath for the ducks. But the revolution hit this tight little town when it was in a happy mood, and the whole populace went out into the woods in honor of the occasion and brought in small trees, which are planted there in four fine rows, well protected by wooden frames. They also dug a ditch as a glorified gutter and set up a sign which reads something like this:

"The Avenue of Liberty. Set out in honor of Russia's day of liberation. Care for the trees and protect them. Water them and teach your children to love them, together with everything in Nature."

NOT a bad sentiment at all, and the day may come when this scrawny avenue of trees will grow up into something more beautiful than the famous Krieger's Allee. The idea of teaching children to love and respect something is worthy of notice, for in Russia, children are not brought up. They just come up, a fact which may or may not account for the lack of standards and moral character among the people. Fickle as Dame Nature is, she can't change as rapidly as Russian politics, and in choosing her as a recipient of loyalty, the parents run no risk of having to change the party name overnight. Nature is about the most constant factor in Russian life today.

There was to have been a meeting in honor of the semi-anniversary of the Revolution, but for some reason that was postponed. We met some workers and chatted with them until one of them took us to a People's Garden, established by the Temperance Society to combat the power of vodka. Sornova deserves a white ribbon from the W. C. T. U., for the workmen of this city voluntarily gave up vodka, forced the Government to close its vodka monopoly shops, and had the town all cleaned up and the wives smiling two months before the Czar forced vodka out of the lives of the entire nation. This signal victory of public sentiment is worthy of the very highest praise, for the factory owners not only did not aid in abolishing vodka, but even opposed the conscientious efforts of the workmen's committees. It required an appeal to the Minister of Finance in Petrograd before the fathers of Sornova could lead the happy families into the People's Garden of a Sunday afternoon, instead of getting drunk.

The directors of the Temperance Society set us up to a very nice impromptu lunch of cheese sandwiches and unlimited tea, and we had a good talk all round. The men were neat, respectful and intelligent, but could not understand why the American workman, with his right to go out on strike and to combine into unions, doesn't demand ten hours' pay for eight hours' work. In Russia, until the Revolution, strikes and trade unions were not allowed; and since capital here has expected and received a much higher return for its money than is usual in America, a new division of the profits between capital and labor appears inevitable.

In Sornova, the women, who suffered most from the vice of vodka, did not form a society to advocate suppressing it, and for a very good reason. In Russia, the woman is the equal of the man and votes with him in the same organization. Just why Russian women should enjoy such unusual freedom is not entirely plain. But the fact is that Russian women are the only women I have ever seen who are as free, as self-reliant, as mind-their-own-business-for-they-have-some, as thoroughly progressive as American women.

Russia is a land without militaristic spirit among men or women, and the women get by worth what they had no need of using force to get. Russia has eagerly copied the latest fashion in the thought life of Western Europe and equality of women, started as a hobby, to prove how advanced Russia was, has continued as a common-sense measure and has proven how advanced Russian women are. The women who have championed revolution in Russia have been such admirable types that no mere men, and least of all Russian men, would have the temerity to suggest that they are not equal.

IN Nizhni Novgorod, the rouble is a weakly little thing, as the result of government activity in the Mint. But at Kazan, we came in contact with two factors in the present Russian situation that were entirely new. The rouble shows considerable backbone in Kazan, and there, for the first time, we came to a place where wages have advanced faster than the cost of living. It is a delight to reach such a city.

A powder-making village near Kazan had blown up a few days before we arrived and it was an exceptional building that had a majority of its windows unbroken, while in some places the force of the explosion carried away the sash as well as the glass. Rumor had caused us to be anxious for the existence of the city, but Kazan was untouched by the fire that accompanied the explosion. As there are many German prisoners in Kazan, it is well that none of them were suspected of being the percussion cap. The extreme socialists, whose methods have been atrocious, are thought to have had a hand in the matter, but powder under certain conditions is liable to start something all by itself, and there is no real ground for thinking that the catastrophe was more than an accident.

Below Kazan, there is a ruined city named Bulgari which illustrates the place the Volga valley has had in the race movements of history. Amulets made by the Finns, beads made in Venice and Genoa, mirrors of polished bronze from Cathay, lustrous tiles in Arabic and Cufic script, crude Byzantine crosses and an Armenian monument, all tell of the varied influences in this Volga city of the eighth to the fourteenth centuries. Bulgari once numbered 150,000 inhabitants, most of whom were of the Turko-Mongol tribe which later moved farther to the south and west and settled in Bulgaria.

THE Finns had a superior culture, but lacked the military organization of the Slavonic and West-European peoples and their culture fell before Kultur. The blue eyes and blond hair of the present-day Finns are the result of the triumph to culture with a "K" over culture with a "C". The fine bronze work of the Turkish tribes, which has been found at Minusinsk, in Siberia, is far better than any contemporary product of West Europe. In Vyatka, where the oldest bronze works found anywhere in East Europe were unearthed, there can be detected a decided Assyrian influence. A catalogue of the many tribes that now make up Russia is long and varied, but the list of tribes and races that have used the Volga Valley as a trade route would exclude few among the races of Eurasia. In fact, there is one spot in Russia where a group of 350 Yenesei Ostiaks have persisted in a tiny island of a sea of tribes, preserving a culture that closely resembles that of the American Indian, although the nearest American Indians are many thousands of miles distant.

Prof. Adler, of Kazan University, who showed us his carefully arranged museum of relics from Bulgari, has just acquired a hunk of rusty metal which was once a coat of mail, buried in an earthenware jar, but which the ignorant peasants have used in attempting to locate deposits of gold. It is a rare experience, in these anxious times in Russia, to step into a museum and there, among the relics of the ages, realize that the present phase of disorganization and disgrace is temporary and not representative.

BUT the many races of Russia and the many religions and sects serve to point a moral to the people who have thrown off Czarism but have instituted nothing equally efficient in its place. Just as the Russian pilgrim requires an ikon to represent his god, so the Russian people require a political ikon, to whom they can look as a representative of law and order. Republics are not made in a day, though short-lived revolutions may cast off age-long oppression.

A trip from the bread lines of Petrograd, waiting for black bread that may not be forthcoming, to the white loaves of Samara, which would serve as patterns for cart-wheels, emphasizes the fact that a land plentifully supplied with food can starve through lack of organization and order. In the past, the Volga, with its myriad huge barges and its impudent little tugs, has been an important factor in feeding the large cities in the north. But the government set so low a price for grain that the farmers refused to sell. The cost of labor had advanced greatly and the factories were producing so little that the manufactured articles which the peasant wants in exchange for his grain, were almost unobtainable at any price. Patriotic or not, the peasants refused to sell for two and a half roubles grain which had cost them six roubles to grow. The soldiers were not fighting, the laborers were not working and the farmer refused to feed drones in return for paper money whose value was rapidly falling.

THE day we were in Kazan, the government raised the fixed rate of two roubles and a half for thirty-six pounds of grain to five roubles. But the grain has not begun to start north and in seven weeks more this huge artery of Russian life will be frozen over. Not only that, but the warm May of last spring, which brought a bumper winter crop, wilted the spring crop of grain so that the peasants of Samara, Saratov and Simbirsk, on the lower Volga, only got back their seed. Siberia has a bumper crop, which will begin to emerge from its hiding in answer to the call of a doubled price, but the railways may prove inadequate to keep even a small stream of food flowing into winter-ridden Petrograd.

The government has tried in many ways to get food into the capital, but though the military men who were trusted with the food supply were many of them honest, they were not Hoovers, and if the big cities of Russia starve it will be disorganization and not lack of food in other parts of Russia that will be responsible. The Northern Caucasus has a big crop this year and much of that may get to the north. But "little mother Volga" has been ignored this year, and her children may suffer on that account.

Idleness is the sticky fly-paper of life.

When God says, "Go!" there is always a trail that leads through.

Many people walk up to the door of opportunity, wonder which way the knob turns, and then are caught napping upon the couch of idleness, hard by the door.

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

CHAPTER XI

LITTLE Miss Wilson would never go dancing down the sidewalk in Red Hill any more. She would never again come shyly but in perfect confidence out to meet the minister as he went down town to the post office, and, putting her moist little hand into his, gravely and affectionately confide her life problems to him.

For the Angel of Death had claimed her that night when Howard was sent for. That is, by the Angel of Death we mean the criminal carelessness and mercenary negligence of a community of so-called Christian people, who thought more of their own ease and money and pleasure than of spending the time and means to guard the health of their own children. The Angel of Death is a pleasant little fiction, good to use at funerals. In reality, the Devil of Disease did the business of rubbing out a precious life, and it was a human devil walking around Red Hill complacently under the name of one of its respectable citizens known as the Mayor, who was, under the by-laws of the Town Council, also the Superintendent of Public Health. The Mayor was an easy going, well-to-do business man, a member of Brother Noyes's church, and a frequent visitor in his pastor's home. He was one of the prominent figures at little Miss Wilson's funeral, which the Methodist Sunday school attended in a body. It would have been a life-long shock to the Mayor if, at that service, Brother Noyes had turned to him and said: "Mr. Mayor, under the regulations of this town you were the guardian of the public health of its citizens. You are the real human cause of this innocent child's death. And in some way you will have to account for it to God, who is your Judge, and may he have mercy on your soul!"

OF course good Brother Noyes never said anything of the kind. Ministers do not say such things at funerals. I wonder if the lies told by ministers at funerals will be written by the Recording Angel in a special volume labeled "Facts About the Dear Departed; Covered Up, Falsified, and Ignored for the Comfort of the Family by an Easy-Going, Soft-Hearted, Feeble-Minded Clergy."

Brother Noyes took the path of least resistance. He knew, as well as Howard, who sat through the service, tortured by the entire course of it, that little Miss Wilson's death was due to the Mayor's carelessness and cowardice. And yet he alluded more than once to the providence of God. And as Howard sat there listening to it all, it sounded like blasphemy or worse to lay the blame of man's wicked carelessness on a loving God.

The service made a profound impression on Howard, not because of anything Brother Noyes said, but because of what he did not say. As he sat there thinking of all the formalism and pretense and hypocrisy of a superficial religion it seemed to him that Red Hill was full of it, and that no place on earth was better fitted for a real Gospel than right there. And what hope was there for it under present conditions? Four feeble and incompetent churches. No common bond of interest between the town and the country, because there was no common bond among the people of the town itself. A narrow, self-centered, sordid, uninterested town. With good people in it, a minimum of crime and poverty, but also a minimum of positive and affirmative enthusiasm for anything worth while.

AND why talk about establishing Christianity over in Europe when in the heart of America there was so little of it? And why go to New York or Boston and try to influence life with the pen when it was a living voice that the world needed more than the printed page after all? And how could he resign from the ministry into which he went knowing all about its hardships and self-denials? Somehow, as that funeral service went on, and he abstracted himself more and more from its concrete and external expression of un-Christianity, his heart and mind flamed up into white heat until, when Brother Noyes gently turned to him and asked him to offer a prayer, his whole passionate feeling burst out in a perfect torrent of longing for vision of God right then and there that would convict and inspire and redeem the people, until they would love God and keep his commandments, and learn from the loss of this child of His the mighty meaning of the great, great word, "Life."

People who heard that prayer will never forget it. Something about it smote their apathetic consciences as with an angel's wing. One man said afterward, "I don't know what it was, but there was something in what he said that made me afraid of myself." And another said, "I wanted to go home and straighten out my affairs, and ask my wife to forgive me for a cross word I said to her that morning."

At the cemetery Howard listened to the service at the grave, then silently shook hands with Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, and walked home. It seemed to him he would choke to death if he rode back in the carriage with the Mayor and the other pall-bearers.

THIS was Wednesday. The letter to the editor of the magazine had been sent the day following little Miss Wilson's death. No one in Red Hill knew the contents of that letter except Howard, Agnes and Rose. It must be said that when the postmaster at Red Hill canceled the stamp on that letter, he held it up to the light and wished for an X-ray eyeball.

But when Howard walked up into his pulpit the following Sunday, people felt as if something out of the ordinary was coming. A life-long habit of watching everybody's private affairs had given Red Hill a gift of morbid telepathy, so abnormally keen that it seemed able to detect to a degree any unusual mental excitement, or the symptoms that led up to a "situation" or a "dramatic climax." The thing came very near being uncanny, it was generally so exact in its diagnosis of what would happen at a public gathering.

The service went on as usual up to the sermon. But the people were not going to be deprived of the expected "event" of the day, for before he began preaching he stepped out by the side of the little pulpit and, eying the people seriously, he spoke, restraining his own feeling, until the calmness of his voice seemed to deny the real importance of what he was saying:

"I wish to make a statement here today which it seems necessary to make on account of other statements which have been made, and in order to let the people know what they ought to know. There has been submitted to me an offer to leave the ministry and Red Hill, and take up journalistic work. It is not necessary for me to go into details. But all I want to say here this morning is that I have refused this offer to leave the ministry, and will remain here, for a time at least, if this church wishes me to stay."

At that point a thing happened that broke all records in the history of the church.

Some one (the Expressman told the Agent next day it was Deacon Allen) started a feeble hand-clap. It was taken up and spread over the church until it grew so loud it waked up old Judge Randolph, the one inveterate chronic sleeper of the congregation, whom no minister, not even Howard, had ever robbed of a nap after the service had been going twenty minutes. He stared around him in surprise, and turned with a bewildered look to his wife. She whispered to him in a loud tone—for the Judge was a little, just a little, deaf—"Mr. Chase is going to stay."

AS soon as the Judge caught the meaning of it he joined in the applause, his face beaming with honest delight. For in spite of the fact that he had not heard a sermon clear through for more than twenty years, he did like Howard, as he met him between Sundays, and had to acknowledge he was different from all the other ministers in Red Hill.

Howard had planned to say a few more words, but the episode of the applause seemed to make it unnecessary. He paused as the excitement quieted down, felt an unusual glow of joy over the spontaneous act of the people, and then gave out his text and began to preach. Even Judge Randolph, jolted out of his customary nap, stayed awake during that sermon, and at its close, when Howard came down into the aisle, the Judge was the first to greet him as everybody crowded up to shake Howard's hand, and men as well as women had tears on their faces and did not seem to be ashamed of them.

"After all," Howard's own eyes filled as the people crowded up, "they do like me. And I like to be liked. They are sheep without a shepherd. I cannot leave them."

"It was worth ten dollars to be there," the Expressman told the Agent, who had not been able to leave the station, because Number Ten was late.

"I suppose that's what you put in," the Agent said.

"I'm a-goin' to increase my subscription to Mr. Chase's salary. We can't afford to lose him."

"What have you been giving?" the Agent asked with more or less incredulity.

"That's one thing people are not supposed to know," the Expressman replied. "I been guessin' for twenty-five years how much Deacon Allen subscribes, an' I bet I can come pretty close to it, but I don't know exact."

"You wouldn't have to guess much," the Agent said, as he rose to sell a ticket to Topeka.

WHEN he came back to the window the Expressman said, "I felt disappointed over one thing yesterday. I was lookin' for an announcement."

"I thought Mr. Chase made one."

"He did, but I thought he'd add a N. B. or a P. S. or something."

"About what?"

"His weddin'. People are gettin' anxious to know when and where it's going to be."

"You don't expect him to advertise that from the pulpit, do you?"

"I've heard the date has been fixed for May 1. But I hain't heard whether it's at the church, or at Deacon Burton's. They could have it outdoors in May, so everybody could go."

"They won't let you in without a dress suit," said the Agent.

"I'm a goin' in my wagon," said the Expressman. "So's to get their trunks on time. An' there won't be no old shoes nor ribbons on 'em either, if I haul 'em."

AFTER the Sunday evening service of that memorable day Howard and Agnes and Rose reviewed the event, and again Howard repeated his reasons for his decision and his plans for the future.

"I answered that letter, as you know, my dears, because I simply could not go out of the ministry. I've figured out we can economize. And Agnes is willing to live the simple life. I can write more. Yesterday I got a check for $50 for a funny story. Think of that, people. Fifty dollars just for one little story of fifteen hundred words. And I believe I can make things go here for a while. I don't need to sleep eight hours. I can do with six, and—"

"Isn't he wonderful, sister?" Rose whispered to Agnes. And Agnes Burton simply nodded. She could not trust herself to speak. Howard was striding across the little room, his eye flashing, his arms tense but not nervous, his whole body keeping time with his mind, the physical glory of his being illustrating in a subtle manner his inner and spiritual self, and Agnes Burton was fascinated yet humbled at the sight of him, as he gently moved, not a rough expression of coarse fiber, but a sense of power which faced great odds and dared them to overpower him. And over and above all, she rejoiced in his decision to remain in the ministry, and she was ready without reserve or shrinking to share with him fully in all that the decision might mean to them both.

During a part of that evening Rose discreetly disappeared at intervals, and in one of them Agnes said to Howard demurely:

"Do you think a man and—and—his wife, ought to share everything—troubles, secrets, plans—er—everything with each other?"

"Certainly I do!" replied Howard positively. "It is the only basis of happy married life. There is no other."

"Very well, then, my lord," said the school teacher, her cheeks glowing and her eyes sparkling, "I have something I want to share with you." And with the words she suddenly put into Howard's hands a little bank book, with her name on the outside.

HE took it, a look on his face so bewildered that she wanted to laugh, only she was a trifle afraid, as she watched him. Mechanically he opened the little book at a place where a slip of paper had his name written on it, a check, making payable to Howard Chase the sum of $1,275.62, and endorsed by the school teacher's signature.

"It is my dowry," she said, as he turned a questioning gaze upon her. "It is one-half of my savings of several years, and it is just as much yours as mine. I will not come to you unless you take it. You have asked me to give you myself, and I have given. And this simply goes with me. You cannot have one without the other. You said we ought to share everything. And we will, won't we?"

Rose had just opened the kitchen door, but she gently stepped back and closed it, and waited a reasonable time.

When she re-entered she said: "Have you been quarreling?"

"Yes, and made up," said Howard promptly. But he was still agitated unusually.

"Is it time for me to retire again?" asked Rose unblushingly.

"Don't go, sister, stay and help me to settle this question. Do you think I ought to take this money?"

"Of course I do," said Rose promptly. "Take all you can get. You can give your wife a dollar or two once in a while if she really needs it."

Red Hill will never forget the occasion of the wedding when Howard Chase and Agnes Burton were married on the first day of May that year. Howard had always had a horror of display at weddings and funerals. Agnes shared his feeling. But they both realized that the public had some claim on them, and finally agreed to have the service in the church and, if the weather was kind, to have a reception out on the lawn. When the announcement was finally made it was so general that the phrase "the friends of Mr. Chase and Miss Burton are invited" covered all necessary conditions.

"There wan't nothin' said about dress suits," the Expressman told the Agent. "You can wear your everyday clothes and be welcome."

"How about presents?" asked the Agent.

"Not a word. No flowers either, nor poems. But I think you ought to give Mr. Chase that one about the bachelor. His wife would frame it."

"I've got something to give them," the Agent said with a grin, and an unusually pleased look.

"Tell me," said the Expressman, pleadingly.

"I will, if you won't tell any one."

"I won't even tell it to the horse," the Expressman solemnly promised.

"Nor the wagon," the Agent echoed.

THE night of the wedding was a perfect Kansas May night. Brother Noyes performed the ceremony in the church, which was packed with all of Red Hill that could get in, and the rest stood out on the lawn, "like the crowd at Senator Woodbine's funeral," as the Expressman said, "only different." The church chorus sang appropriate music. And the church furnished refreshments out on the lawn to everybody. The farmers came in for fifteen miles around, and came up and shook Howard's hand as he stood proud and handsome by the side of the school teacher. "The finest looking couple in the state!" the Washburn college graduate farmer told a neighbor, the college farmer who had told Howard on the occasion of his visit that he and his wife required the refinements of worship in order to make them go to church. This man seemed unusually thoughtful during the evening, and twice took occasion to tell Howard he was glad he had decided to remain in Red Hill.

When the evening was finally over and the last guest gone, Howard and his wife and Rose went over to the parsonage. Rose had kept open house there, presiding over the presents and showing them to the crowd that all during the evening made a procession through the rooms.

"Look out here!" said usually quiet Rose, but tonight she radiated electric excitement in four directions.

She led the way to the kitchen, and waved her hand around.

"There! Mrs. Chase! Talk about the high cost of living! There's groceries to burn, for a month!"

"I hope some one remembered to send us a can-opener," said Howard, as he looked at the display of canned goods which covered the kitchen table several feet high, while groceries and vegetables of every description were piled on the floor through which Rose had made lanes leading to closets and doors.

"We can begin here by the stove and eat our way over to the sink, and then start over there by the cupboard and by the middle of next week we can get to the cellar door," said Rose, as she led the way back into the sitting room to direct the bride's and groom's attention to presents brought in that evening which they had not yet seen.

AMONG them was a long envelope containing an interesting communication from the trustees of the church.

To Rev. Howard Chase,
Pastor Congregational Church,
Red Hill, Kansas.

DEAR BROTHER: In view of your faithful and efficient services since you came to us a year ago, and as a slight token of our appreciation of your sacrifice in remaining with us, the trustees and the church ask you to receive the enclosed, and also wish to inform you that at a meeting of the church held last night it was voted to increase your salary this year to twelve hundred dollars.

Wishing you and Mrs. Chase great blessing, we are,
Very sincerely yours,

H. S. ALLEN,
Chairman Board of Trustees.

R. F. BURTON,
Senior Deacon.

A check for one hundred dollars was attached to the letter. But the surprising thing about it all to Howard and Agnes was that the church could hold a meeting, vote such an increase, and no whisper of it reach them until now. And as a matter of fact, the event surprised Red Hill as much as any one.

Howard and Agnes examined other presents, a really bewildering display, and as they finally went into the study where Rose had put certain articles, Howard found a letter in the middle of his desk, with the familiar Santa Fe mark on the envelope.

The typewritten address disclosed the identity of the author.

"Ah! My friend, the Agent! I recognize his typewriting!" said Howard. "Come here, Mrs. Chase, I have an inspiration that this is for you as well as for me."

And he was right. The Agent enclosed a poem on "The Bachelor," to which was pinned a check for ten dollars from an Eastern magazine. The Agent's note said—

DEAR MR. AND MRS. CHASE: The enclosed verses will be published some time. They got past the editor while he was asleep at the switch, and he made out the check before he was wide awake. Please accept the same with my best wishes. May you have a pleasant and profitable journey over the Matrimonial Road, and meet with no wild circus trains on the trip. May your signals burn clear and your orders give you the right of way over the Sunday excursions. If you should ever travel on a real railroad let me recommend the Santa Fe. It is the only road running into Red Hill, and on that account the only road running out again. Its rule is "Safety First," and I hope you will never take it to go out of town without buying a round-trip to come back.
Your friend,
THE AGENT.

HOWARD, with his arm about Mrs. Chase, the two handsome heads close together, read aloud the Agent's literary effusion which had managed to break into print in the unguarded moments of the editor at an expense of ten dollars:

He belonged to the bachelor class,
And every day,
He was heard to say,
"It's a weary world! Alas! Alas!"

He's no more in the bachelor class,
Because he has found,
By looking around
In this weary world, a lass, a lass.

As he finished reading, Howard looked around at the lass, and you can guess what he did.

"Thank God! I have found a lass! May he make me worthy of her!" was his prayer that happy moment.

And—oh, yes, we had nearly forgotten the Expressman's gift. All through the evening, in between the unnumbered refreshments he managed to get acquainted with, the Expressman had been seen at times hovering dimly on the outskirts of the lawn, where Howard thought he could catch an outline of the horse and wagon out in the road. When he took his turn to extend congratulations to Howard and Agnes he said, "Mr. and Mrs. Chase, if you are going to go off on a trip, I'll haul your trunks down to the station for nothin', and glad to do it. And I'll sit on 'em all night to keep the boys from doin' anythin' to 'em until you get away."

Howard thanked him heartily and told him not to tell any one, as it was not known, but he would make him the custodian of a secret. The plan was to go to Topeka in a day or two, but Mrs. Chase and he did not wish to let it be generally known.

The Expressman was so gratified over this act of confidence that he kept the secret absolutely for more than an hour. Then he managed to circle around the yard in between the refreshments until he found Howard again.

"Mr. Chase," he managed to whisper, "would you mind if I told the Agent about that trip? I'll just bust if I can't tell some one. And he and I work the trip business together."

"You have my permission, all right," said Howard gravely. "Tell him to be sure to make out the tickets via Pauline."

AND that evening, after coming out of the study with the Agent's poem, Howard stumbled over a suitcase which stuck out behind the edge of the casing.

It was from the Expressman, and it represented considerable savings. Rose silently eyed it with some disapproval, as it was not made of the highest-priced leather. But Howard said, "We'll have to go on that trip now, anyway, or it will be the disappointment of his life. And I'll be proud to carry his suitcase all the way."

And so it came to pass that he did. And Agnes and he had the satisfaction of getting out of Red Hill so quietly that there was hardly any one down at the station but the Agent, and the Expressman who sat on the trunks until the train came in, and showed the greatest pleasure at the sight of the suitcase which Howard insisted on holding prominently in front of him as he bade the Expressman good-by.

They spent a blissful week in Topeka; called on the Governor, who asked them to come again; climbed up to the top of the State House dome so that they could tell the Expressman about the view; went out to Washburn College and admired the view of Burnett's Mound so much that they finally walked out there and were rewarded with the sight of a wonderful sunset; spent a part of the hundred-dollar check on Kansas Avenue, and returned on Number Five to Red Hill, where the Expressman greeted them with a receptive smile and insisted on taking their trunks up to the parsonage free.

Then Howard and his wife settled down to the regular church and parish life.

It was the happiest, most divinely human period of all their lives, and they were profoundly and unquestionably glorified together. But all that did not obscure or hide or minimize certain facts which Howard's one year's experience had already sharply impressed upon him.

The four churches fought for their existence in a pitiful way. Try as hard as he would, Howard could not conceal the fact that, as the weeks and months went on, his task really grew no easier, and in spite of all the spiritual vision the people had received, the town had no community spirit. One day in July, when the heat of the Kansas summer was over the prairie, Brother Noyes came past the parsonage yard where Howard was sitting.

THE Methodists had not rebuilt.

The days had gone by, and they had worshiped part of the time in the other churches and part of the time in the movie show place, which Jake Seymour had let them have for a small rental. But to Howard's surprise the contemplated new church did not materialize, and according to his own uninquisitive habits he had not ventured to quiz Brother Noyes about it.

He stopped now, and at Howard's invitation took off his coat and sat down.

"I suppose you've wondered, Brother Chase, why we haven't begun to build. Well, the plain fact is, brother, we have had some trouble with the Mission Board. Things have dragged along, and we have been encouraged to hold on, but no funds are forthcoming, and we have been put off so long now that we begin to think the Board does not intend to do anything. We are not able to build without help, and" (he lowered his voice) "do you know, the business men are beginning to hold back on subscriptions. Men like Deacon Burton and Mr. Wilson are beginning to complain about the number of churches in a small town. Of course," Brother Noyes added, with a sad smile, "I read enough to know what is going on among the churches in America along the line of federation, and all that. And to tell the truth, my dear brother, I think the community idea will have to prevail for the preservation of the church itself—I mean all churches—but until some of my older people die, or get converted, I don't know how it will be possible here."

They talked over the situation a long time, and to Howard's great surprise, when Brother Noyes opened his heart to him he found the older man was in perfect sympathy with Howard's plans, which were taking shape along the line of some sort of union effort that would lift the community out of its commonplaces and give the churches some right to exist.

ABOUT this time in Howard's and Agnes's experiences came interesting letters from Mr. and Mrs. Lennox concerning Inez. They had kept them informed about Inez from the beginning, but these July letters brought some new developments.

Mrs. Lennox wrote: "Inez is a remarkable girl in many ways. She is a child and grown woman at the same time, and is a creature of moods and sometimes of passion. She has absorbed the city life as if she had always lived here. I shudder to think what might have become of her if she had come to New York by herself. She tells us that the only thing that has kept her from doing wrong is her thought of us. That is reward enough for all the care and anxiety we have felt for her."

"We have discovered that she is genuinely fond of little children. That is a great virtue. But we have also discovered, or rather she had discovered for herself, that she has a gift for children's stories. Roy suggested to her lately that if she could put some of these stories into a scenario, the film companies here might do something with them. She has become deeply, even passionately, enthusiastic over the suggestion, and is spending nearly all her time over a child's story illustrating the growth of two children living in exactly opposite conditions. She has met at Edison's a young photographer who seems to understand her perfectly, and he says he will help her in any way he can to visualize her story if it is accepted for the picture play. His name is Andrew Morris, and he is, I think, one of the plainest-looking men in New York. But Inez never seems to think of it, only being interested in his photography, which is of a peculiar kind. The young man himself is all right. And his plainness of feature is offset by a beautiful voice. No, I don't think Inez will fall in love with him, but I can't answer for the other thing."

"Inez has the making of a beautiful, useful, happy woman. We are doing all we can for her. If she should succeed in her story effort, it may determine her whole future. She will stay on with us as long as she is willing to be with us. We have come to love her as if she were indeed our very own."

JULY slipped into August and August into September and September into fall, and the glory of the prairie flooded Red Hill with matchless days and nights. And Howard's church problems grew with each succeeding month. He had all through the summer made careful study of the town and the country surrounding. His survey had given him certain clear and definite conclusions. And standing out above everything else, always was the plain fact that the churches were not doing what they ought to do, and above all that Red Hill had no community conscience or consciousness, and life was commonplace and dreary and wasteful and narrow and tasteless to most of the seven hundred inhabitants.

He studied the thing from every angle. He had long talks with Agnes and Rose and Deacon Burton. He went out again, more than once, to see the young Washburn College graduate farmer, and after every visit left behind him a more deeply interested and thoughtful man. But as November slipped away and December began, he was no nearer his dream of the Best Thing for Red Hill.

"Howard Chase" in Book Form

PASTOR SHELTON'S fine story, "Howard Chase," is just issued in book form by the George H. Doran Company, publishers, New York. This story of a big man in a small town—the most gossipy town in Kansas, of Howard Chase the minister, with whom all the attractive young ladies of the district fall in love, of the foibles and follies of church folk, and the redemption of the town by the creation of the Community Club which dispelled the spirit of gossip and narrowness and self-centered satisfaction, and recreated a clean, wholesome, spiritual atmosphere, is now ready for you in permanent form. "Howard Chase" in volume form, neatly bound, can be purchased of the Doran Company at $1.25.

Linking with God

IT was unquestionably sound advice which the Archbishop of York, during his series of discourses in old Trinity Church, New York, gave to his audience when he said that if the American people would "link yourselves with God," it would be "one of the greatest things accomplished by the war." In a previous sermon, he had urged that they should consecrate themselves to their country and to the moral issues of the high cause on which they had embarked. This the nation has already done. To link themselves with God is to "get right with God," individually, as communities, and as a nation—to repent of our sins and obtain forgiveness and to range ourselves on the side of the Divine will in all things. Only by sincere repentance and by humbling ourselves before the Ruler of the universe and seeking to know His will, can such a union be attained. Every nation has its besetting sins; we have ours. Let us, then, humble ourselves before Him and seek His guidance and direction.

Easter is at hand, and will soon dawn upon a world in turmoil. In an appeal to the Christian churches of America, recommending an Easter week of prayer, the thought is thus expressed:

"In a day when the world is tossed as a boat in the sea, it becomes us to seek God, who measures the waters in the hollow of His hand. Called to serve our own generation, our highest service should begin in lowliest bowing before Almighty God our Father. Since no Easter like that we now approach ever dawned upon the world before, it is manifestly wise that in a new purpose we give the week preceding to a fellowship of Prayer and Intercession. Seeking Him whose unabated love keeps us from being consumed, let us prepare our hearts as guest chambers made ready for the Lord. In united prayer we shall know each other better, in drawing near to Christ we shall draw nearer to each other the whole world around, in praying for one another, the hurt of our own heart may be healed."

This is the spirit in which we should greet the coming Easter. We would rejoice to see a great movement having for its purpose the drawing of the nation nearer to God by prayer, by holier living, and by ceaselessly seeking to know His will and to do it. We need this in our homes, our municipalities, our legislatures, our churches—everywhere.

The Farmers' Spring Drive

THESE are the days in which the biggest of all our national industries—the farms of America—are making plans for the great spring drive. Unless all signs fail, there will soon be in the field, guiding many thousands of plows, an army larger by far than any now in the war zones. Tractors by the thousand, teams by the tens of thousands, will turn up furrows innumerable. Brawn and muscle will press on and "over the top," to prepare for a harvest that will give life and strength to the world.

For over a year, we have been feeding 16,000,000 among the peoples of lands across the sea. We have fed 8,000,000 British, 4,200,000 French, 2,000,000 Italian and a smaller number in Russia. We have fed to starving Europe's noncombatant populations and to the soldiers of the allies, 110,000,000 bushels of good, sound American wheat and wheat flour and 648,000,000 pounds of pork and its products. In three and one-half years, our farms have supplied 212,750,000 bushels of oats, 24,310,000 of corn and 3,618,000 of rye, besides butter, cheese and milk products.

It is imperative that this should be continued during the coming year and even increased. And this, in addition to the supplying of home needs, puts the farmer on his mettle. On the success of his spring drive will depend largely the well-being and possibly the fate of nations. He knows that he is fighting scarcity at home and gaunt famine abroad. Yet he has the courage that is equal to the situation. Abundant seed is available for the planting of the mammoth farms of the great Northwest, and also for the smaller farms of the Middle and Eastern states.

Yet, with all their forces mobilized, the farmers of America will this year be short-handed. At the very time when American agricultural labor should be most abundant, it is a problem to find enough men for the work. But there will be no failures nor half-hearted efforts. As soon as the frost is out of the soil, work will begin and it will be pushed, and pushed vigorously, until the last furrow is turned and the last field fertilized and plowed and harrowed and seeded and rolled. Sun and shower and dew and assiduous cultivation will do their work, and then will come in due time the blessings from the Lord of the harvest.

Paganism and Pessimism

MISSIONARIES who can speak with authority on educational and spiritual conditions in Japan record the singular fact that suicide among Japanese students is probably more prevalent than among students in any other land. Whether this is due to exceptional sensitiveness and nerves that are high-strung, or more directly to the extraordinary competition of students to secure places in the government schools, is a matter for conjecture. There are probably few men better informed on missionary conditions in the Far East than Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, who has sent us some very remarkable statistics in connection with this suicidal mania, which point to the conclusion that the cause is spiritual.

One student of nineteen, before taking his life after failure at an examination, wrote to his father: "Having missed the road to success, I go into the night. . . . The days of a man's life are but fifty sad years—the end—dust." In 1914 there were 241 suicides under sixteen years, 801 between sixteen and twenty, and 3,086 between twenty and thirty. Some years earlier—1902—an epidemic of student suicides startled the country. One university graduate, brilliant and widely known, flung himself into the river above the famous Kegon waterfall near Nikko, and his body was found a few days afterward, battered among the rocks, 600 feet below. He left a letter in which he had written: "I have studied all that science and philosophy have to teach about the problem of existence. I have examined all the religions for their answers to the problem of life. Nowhere have I found anything satisfactory. I now go into the other world to search for the solution myself."

Led by this example, many other students ended their careers on the same spot in like manner. These cases multiplied until guards were stationed at the head of the waterfall to stop the tragedy, and a barricade of posts was built; but the human cataract could not be stopped. No less than 248 men and women ended their lives at that tragical spot! Many others found the same solution in the volcanic crater of Asama—how many no one knows.

The truth is that the pagan religions are proving more and more unsatisfying. They are decadent and disintegrating. And it is probably inevitable that, in the breaking-up process, many beautiful lives must pass out and many noble careers be wrecked. This very fact that such conditions exist in Japan, showing the pessimism that springs from paganism, should become an incentive to increased missionary effort for the spread of Christianity. The Japanese themselves perceive this necessity. Major Gen. Hibiki, who recently visited New York, has said: "When Tokyo is a Christian city, Japan will be a Christian nation. When Japan is a Christian nation, the Orient will have been saved!" With Japan Christian, the conquest of the East would be greatly simplified.

Who will help Missionary Gulick and his associates to do this pressing work?

Saving the Potatoes

AN appeal in behalf of the dehydrated potato is being made by the Department of Agriculture in a campaign to save the surplus potato crop, which, it is stated, is doomed to spoil in enormous quantities unless immediate steps are taken to utilize it.

The surplus is estimated by the Department to be between 100,000,000 and 125,000,000 bushels. Michigan is said to have approximately 20,000,000 more bushels than there is a market for because of the railroad congestion. The home garden movement and the plea to the farmer to increase his potato acreage are responsible for the remarkably big yield. On the other hand, the zeal of the housewife and restaurateur in living up to the doctrine of food conservation lessened the demand.

"Eat more potatoes" is the slogan of the new campaign. The potato, the Department claims, has never received proper recognition as a food in the United States. The consumption per person in this country is three and one-half bushels. Before the war Germany was eating eight bushels per man.

The Department's first action is to urge the housewives in the producing centers to use the fresh potato in their bread-making, since potato can be added to wheat flour in amounts up to thirty per cent with excellent results, and the Food Administration has listed it as a flour substitute. They are also urged to substitute it as far as possible on their daily menus for other food.

It is the housewife in the consumption centers suffering from a potato shortage because of lack of transportation facilities whom the department will endeavor to familiarize with the uses of the dehydrated potato. The chief value of dehydrated vegetables at this time lies in their saving of ear space. A dried potato weighs about one-fifth as much as the fresh product. Modern methods of drying fruits and vegetables preserve their nutritious properties and natural flavors and, when cooked properly, the difference between them and the fresh products in taste is scarcely distinguishable. The English and French armies use millions of pounds of dehydrated potatoes and other vegetables.

Dehydration being comparatively new as an industry in this country, there are not enough plants to help preserve to any appreciable extent the potato surplus that is worrying the farmer and the government. It is better, says the Department of Agriculture, to feed potatoes to stock than to let them rot. It may be trouble to cook a meal of potatoes for a cow, but the Department bids the farmer to think of the saving it means in this day of the high cost of stock feed.

Scientists in a Tangle

BY way of a diversion from more serious topics, the evolutionists have stirred up anew the age-old discussion of man's origin. Professor Wood Jones of London, having convictions and disdaining to longer remain silent, has flung down by way of a challenge to the scientific world the assertion that Darwin was an egregious blunderer and that apes were not the progenitors but the descendants of the race of man. He declares that the find of what anthropologists have called the "Talgai skull" in Australia has revealed that it really belongs to an age so remote that it must be set down as being the skull of a human creature who lived before apes appeared on the earth.

This is very interesting and must have been tremendously exciting to evolutionists generally, since we find them simultaneously rising at points far remote from each other, to take up the Englishman's challenge. Prof. Franz Boas of Columbia University, New York, gleefully grasps the opportunity and counters by claiming that both Darwin and Jones are wrong—that neither the human race nor the monkeys descended from one another, but both sprang from some animal belonging to an age far earlier than any of which we now have a geological trace. Dr. Boas brings Professor Smith of Sydney University, Australia, into the arena as the man who classified the "Talgai skull" as that of a young proto-Australian, probably a bushman. Next comes Dr. Norris, President of the Royal Society of Queensland, who admits that geological evidence of the antiquity of the Talgai remains was lacking. Last to enter the circle of scientific controversy is Dr. Edward Hickey Bradford, of Harvard, who disagrees with them all and caps the climax of discussion by proclaiming that the true line of human descent led back to the lizard, and that the race of men must trace its remotest ancestry to the great saurians, from which sprang not only human beings, but dogs, horses and monkeys also. Just when a break occurred in the lizard family resulting in this strange development, or whether the breaks occurred at long intervals apart, none of the scientists could or would explain. There will need to be a good deal more of deep digging and hard thinking before light comes on these confusing points.

This inextricable tangle hardly puts the science of anthropology in a very favorable light. If guesswork were to command a premium, each of these distinguished gentlemen would certainly have earned it. There is in this discussion a strong reminder of the poem which a famous American wrote many years ago, describing the exciting scenes of a meeting of archeologists on the Stanislaus, when, as one of the foremost speakers was advancing his theories, somebody put in a protest and the speaker was abruptly stopped—by "a chunk of old red sandstone." We do not suggest, of course, that any of these gentlemen in the present case deserve such treatment; but it does seem like a mockery of science that a discussion should develop on lines which do not converge at any point, when the old Bible, which is not a scientific manual, disposes of the whole subject with a brief and dignified reference, clothed in such nobility of language and clearness of expression that none need misunderstand. And as far as history and investigation have led up to the present time, this record of Genesis has never been successfully contested.

Winds of March

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

JUST before Easter the wind is bitter cold.
The trees look gaunt and sullen, the world seems worn and old;
And the ground is bare and muddy, the sky is swept with black;
Adventure lies behind you and there seems no going back.
When the chill of pallid winter is a prowling beast and bold . .
Then it's just before Easter,
And the wind is bitter cold!

And then comes Easter—and the wind is soft and low,
And the trees are drifted over with the white of blossom snow,
And the ground is green and springy and the sky is bright and blue,
And the world is all adventure that is ever calling you.
When the beauty of God's heaven rests upon the earth below . .
Then it's Easter, joyful Easter,
And the soft winds blow!

MAGAZINE covers for March are given to the display of pretty, perplexed girl faces, with umbrellas, blown inside out, above them. March illustrations, on calendars, picture hats rolling blithely away from their irate owners. Poems speak of March as a lion, a lion fierce, untamed. March is always thought of as the most unpleasant month in the year, the most primitive one, the most bitterly cold one. And yet March is the last month of winter, and spring, with its fresh grasses, and soft breezes, and delicately sweet flowers, is waiting, with April and May in its train, just around the corner.

Perhaps it's because March is the last month of cold weather that makes it seem so hard. Perhaps that is the reason why March winds seem so much more cruel than January and February winds. (I myself have had hats blown off and umbrellas turned inside out in November and December, but I haven't resented it as I would have resented the same things in March!) Perhaps it's because folk are so weary of winter, so wistfully anxious for the coming of spring, that March seems so especially long in weeks and days and hours.

ONCE knew of a settlement house that was struggling to get along in a particularly poor part of a great city. Two brave women were giving their little capital, their time, and their very lives, so that they might bring a bit of joy and the story of a Wonderful Love into a dreary slum.

"We will start this work," they said, "and God will make the way clear for us to finish it!" And so with prayer and hope in their hearts they spent their small amount of money to buy necessary things for the house and for the poor people who came to it for help in the time of pain and trouble.

The capital lasted for nearly six months. And then came a day when the settlement house was without food and fuel, when the folk who came for help had to be turned away with empty hands. And then came another day more hopeless than the first, and another.

It was on the evening of the third day that one of the women, no longer brave, collapsed.

"Our money is gone!" she said bitterly. "We have no food, and the house is cold. It's winter, and what can we two do—alone?"

The other woman, though hungry, was still brave. She still trusted.

"We are not alone," she said gently. "God is with us!"

The first woman spoke even more bitterly.

"Sometimes," she said, "I find myself wondering if God is with us. Sometimes I find myself being rather sure that he isn't. I'm hungry, I'm cold, and—I'm through!"

The other woman looked at her pitously. She saw their part of the slums left still dark, still without the hint of a Wonderful Story.

"Just give it one more trial!" she pleaded. "I'm sure we won't be allowed to fail!"

The first woman set her lips.

"I'm going to stay here tonight," she answered. "Tomorrow—"

And she turned away with an air of finality.

All through that night, in that chill, barn-like house, one woman prayed for a sign for guidance, while another, rolled up in insufficient blankets, slept fitfully. And then morning came.

They rose grimly, the two of them, and dressed. Because there was no food there was no breakfast to get. And then suddenly, out of the stillness, came the postman's whistle at the door.

"A letter!" whispered one woman. But the other one, running to answer the shrill summons, murmured:

"The hand of God!"

The envelope that the postman brought held a letter and a check.

"I felt," read the letter, "very strongly, last night, that some one was needing help. And so I got out of my bed, and dressed, and wrote this letter to you. Why God made me think of you I do not know! I hope that this check will help you, and if you need them there will be other checks." And the letter was signed with the name of a nearly forgotten friend.

The two women looked at each other, wordlessly, for a moment. And then one of them spoke.

"I should have trusted more," she said. "But the way looked very dark!"

And the other woman answered her with a glory in her eyes and a note of triumph in her voice.

"We were not alone!" said the other woman; "and it is always darkest just before dawn!"

THAT settlement house is the largest one in a great city now. It is able to help as it wanted to help. But the two women who are still the heads of it often remember that night when despair was so very near, when faith itself seemed just about gone, and hope was dying.

"It's always darkest just before dawn!" The old saying will ever carry a ring of truth. It was in the darkness just before dawn that the Indians—perhaps the craftiest fighters of all—made their fierce attacks. It is in the time just before dawning that doctors fear for their very ill patients, for vitality is lowest before dawning. The time before dawn is the hardest time to bear.

And, as it is always darkest just before dawn, so is it always coldest just before spring. It is quite natural that March, the last month of winter, should seem the coldest month of all. It is quite natural that March should seem longer, more trying, than other months. And yet, if we try to remember that spring is waiting around the corner, waiting smilingly, the winds of March will take on a different aspect and will seem just sent to heighten our anticipation and to make spring seem more wonderful when it does arrive.

The Army and Navy Canteen

"DOING one's bit" is an expressive phrase these war days. Every good American detests the word "slacker," as applied to himself, even by implication; so the loyal American man or woman lends a hand anywhere and everywhere. In years past the army and navy canteens have been spoken of collectively, but "canteen" usually implied liquid refreshments for our boys in uniform until our Uncle Sam began to hedge it about with restrictions.

Among the modern army and navy canteens is one established by the generosity of Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., at 21 Beekman Place, New York. Here our brave defenders can find home comforts and what they need to eat and drink at a nominal sum, music, books, magazines, comfortable chairs, baths, individual writing-desks, etc. Mrs. Vanderbilt and her daughter Muriel have personally presented kit bags to many of the men, and New Testaments have been supplied by the Y. M. C. A. Prayer books have also been given to those who desired them. All were highly appreciated.

THOUSANDS of women with no time to waste over their dishpans now use Gold Dust—because it dissolves the grease so nicely.

They also use Gold Dust to clean—without scratching—the finest porcelain bathtubs and lavatories.

Also, to keep the kitchen sink sweet and clean, because Gold Dust dissolves the grease, leaves no sediment to clog the drain and rinses out beautifully.

But, of course, they make sure it is really Gold Dust they use.

A large-scale military drill featuring a massive formation of soldiers on horseback and in horse-drawn artillery wagons, moving across a field. The formation is dense and organized, with many soldiers on horseback and several large artillery pieces being moved by teams of horses. The scene is set in an open field, and the overall impression is one of a large-scale military exercise.

Why Folks Need Bran

Your Doctor, If You Ask Him, Will Say This:

Bran is Nature's laxative. It was put on wheat to supply the needed roughage.

Omit it, and fine foods clog the system. Then most folks must take drugs.

A Bad Habit

Drug-taking is a bad habit, and it grows. Right living—right food—will make it unnecessary.

A bran-mixed diet is the proper inner cleanser.

Sunnier Days

The morning bran dish now saves many a dull day, many a grouch. It is a smile-breeder, a source of good cheer.

It helps to keep one fit.

Not Clear Bran

Clear bran is unnecessary. It is uninviting.

By doctors' request, we have made a delightful cereal dish which is 25 per cent bran flakes. It is called Pettijohn's.

We use tender bran, so it isn't gritty. We use flake bran to be doubly efficient.

And we hide it in a welcome dainty, in delicious cereal flakes of wheat and oats.

A 7-Day Test

We urge you to make a one-week test. See how Pettijohn's betters your breakfasts, see how it betters your days.

See what it adds to your spirits and your vim.

Let the results of that one-week test decide the bran question for you.

Start tomorrow morning.

Questions and Answers

MRS. B. F. M., Rockhill, S. C. Personal salvation is the individual heart getting right with God and receiving forgiveness. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." is the declaration of Scripture, which means simply coming in sincere repentance for your sins, to accept Christ as Saviour, to confess him as such before men, and then to ask divine help daily to keep you true to your new allegiance. It is true that we must work out our own salvation (Phil. 2:12, 13), but it is God who worketh in us. God gives the Word of Life; we must do the believing. He gives the pardon, we take it into our own heart and life; he gives power, but we must do our part in using it; he gives his Spirit to work in us the works of the Spirit, but it is ours to give gladly to such work our heart, lips, tongue, voice, words and actions. In short, we place our whole life in his keeping, and putting all doubt and fear aside, live and work and act as he would have us.

Reader, Minneapolis. The question of forgiveness and the Christian attitude thereon has been repeatedly discussed in the Mail-Bag.

F. G., Morristown, N. J. There is no record of the number of Christians at the close of Jesus' ministry, but it may have been considerable, as we are told in various passages in the Gospels that many believed on him. In Acts 1:15, however, there is a definite starting-point, where we have the first actual Christian Church assembly, with 120 souls present. Doubtless there were more than these, many times over, throughout the localities where the Saviour had addressed the multitudes, who, we are expressly told, "heard him gladly."

Dr. Katherine Wambold, a missionary in Korea, sends this incident to the Mail-Bag, showing how a little tact applied at the right moment relieved her party and herself from an awkward predicament. She writes: "Last month I was going to Sang Sim Ni, one hundred li (33 miles) from Seoul, to meet the Christians there for a study class with the women. The roads were bad, it was growing late and my Korean assistant and I were walking, in order to make it easier for the jinriksha men. We were going along a new road on the side of the hill, with a wide river at the foot. As we approached a crowd of men working, they all ran toward us, and told us to go back, which we did at once, and all was quiet. I then asked for the foreman—a Japanese—and he explained that "hito" (people) might go on that special piece of road, but no beasts nor wheels, and that we must go back, cross the river, then cross back to the road farther on. It was a great disappointment, as I should miss reaching the meeting-house that night, where the Christians were gathered; but I wished to say something soothing to the men, so I said, "Shitser ai i-ashi mashita." ("I have been very rude, please excuse me"), and smiled as well as I could. But after I had walked a short distance, the foreman came running after me and said if the men would carry the jinrikshas across the new part of the road, so that the wheels did not touch, we might go. This we did, with very light hearts, obeying the letter of the law and the spirit too, I hope. Fortunately this Japanese was conversant with Korean speech, so we could understand each other. We parted with bows and smiles, my parting words being, "You surely must be a Christian, to do so kind an act as this."

The superintendent of a small Sunday school in California, writes to the Mail-Bag asking if some church or Sunday school which thinks of discarding its old supply of hymn-books would like to help this needy school by giving it the books. An old set of the "Make Christ King" hymnal would be especially appreciated. The Christian Herald will furnish the address to any inquirer.

H. H., Bucklin, No. 1. "The fear of God" is to be interpreted in two ways: first, as fear in the sense of reverence and loyal obedience to his laws, and second, in the sense of realizing that God is just and that the unrepentant sinner must face the consequences of violating his laws. The whole message of the Gospel is that God desires man's loving obedience, and that none need fear him if they turn from their sins and obtain forgiveness. 1 John 4:18 pictures the Christian life from which all terror is removed when it says, "perfect love casteth out fear." 2. It has often been observed that aged saints, as the time of their departure draws near, have experiences that cannot be explained except on the principle that, as the hold on the affairs of material life relaxes, the veil between time and eternity grows thinner and more transparent, and the senses are susceptible of spiritual perceptions to which those absorbed in the affairs of the world cannot attain.

A. D., Greensboro, Ala. 1. Admiral Mahan was for many years our leading authority on naval matters, and is still frequently quoted. 2. It has been estimated that fully 60 per cent. of the adult population of the United States are engaged, either directly or indirectly, in agriculture and its related callings.

R. E. C., West Pinley, Pa. The questions you mention are largely controversial.

An Earnest Seeker. Would God be pleased if there were no evil in the world?

He certainly would; and when his Son returns to rule, evil will be eliminated. This, despite the passage in Isa. 45:7, "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil." This passage does not refer to moral evil, but to discord or disturbance in the order of the universe as a whole. Thus as light and darkness are opposites, so, in the next clause of the verse, peace and disorder are opposites. Evil is the negation of good, and distinction must be made between natural and moral evil. Among natural evils are wars, earthquakes, storms, plagues, or whatever disturbs or disarranges the perfection of natural things; whereas moral evil is thought, word or act that is contrary to the revealed law of God, and is therefore sin. It is the peculiarity of Hebrew writing to delight in contrasts. Thus in the passage in Isaiah the prophet uses the converse of the peace he had been talking of. He uses the word "evil" in the sense of punishment or misery. It is the state of the nation that he is considering. It serves God and is faithful to him, and is prosperous. The prosperity comes from God. It deserts and disobeys God and is punished by captivity and oppression. They are the logical results of disobedience, and as God permits the punishment to follow the sin, in that sense he creates the condition which men regard as an evil. There is a similar argument in Rom. 11:22. Moral evil he never creates, for evil is the negative of good. God is the source of all goodness, and "no evil dwells in Him"; but with the withdrawal of his guiding and protecting Spirit from man, evil comes.

Mrs. H. G. L., Grooville, N. Y. The letter v. is an abbreviation of the word "verse," and vv. means "verses," the doubling of the letter indicating the plural.

B. L., Beaver Falls, Minn. (1) Is it true that after having made man, God was sorry for what he had done? (2) Is suicide an unpardonable sin?

(1) The passage Gen. 6:6 can best be understood by remembering that in our language, suited to our nature and experience, we have no expressions really suitable to describe the mind of God. God cannot change (Num. 23:19; 1 Sam. 15:29), nor be affected with sorrow like man; but in language suited to human understanding he is described as about to alter his visible procedure toward mankind. From being merciful and long-suffering he was about to show himself a God of judgment by employing the powers and agencies of the system in which they had been placed as the instruments of these punishments; and as that impious race had broken his laws and filled up the measure of their iniquities, he was about to introduce a display of divine justice. (2) No murderer (and a suicide is a self-murderer) has eternal life abiding in him (see 1 John 3:15). Any person who, having his reason and his mental powers unimpaired, deliberately kills himself, gives evidence by his act that he is not and never has been a true Christian, and therefore cannot have an inheritance in heaven. On the other hand there is no doubt that a large proportion of those who commit suicide are of unsound mind at the time. The brain is unbalanced and the person is not responsible for his act. We may be quite sure that if a Christian loses control of his faculties and in that condition kills himself, we have no right to assume that by that act he forfeits his claim upon divine mercy and forgiveness.

J. T., Lake Town, Utah. Is fasting a duty? Does it promote consecration?

Fasting has been practised in all ages of the Jewish and Christian Church, and, as will be seen from Matt. 6:16-18, not always with the best motives. When it is practised with the object of fitting the soul for close communion with God, or of bringing the body in subjection, it is good. Self-indulgence leads to carelessness and indifference to spiritual things, which may be corrected by an occasional or regular fast, and that, too, need not be only from the pleasures of the table. The purpose of the fast should be clearly kept in mind. It is not to win merit, but, by disciplining the body, to help the spirit to come nearer to God and to gain spiritual power.

Mrs. H. T., Cortland, N. Y. What Scriptural proof have we that we shall know each other after death?

We find the assurance of heavenly recognition in a number of passages in the Old and New Testaments. David said of his dead son, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (11 Sam. 12:23). See also the parable of Dives and Lazarus, which teaches recognition. See Phil. 3:20; Heb. 12:1; Matt. 17:3; Rev. 6:9; Rom. 14:12; Luke 16:23; Rev. 6:9, 10; 1 Thess. 4:13-18; Heb. 13:17; Matt. 8:11. These and others indicate the preservation of identity. We have no reason to doubt that the redeemed will know each other, that pure friendships begun on earth will there be perfected, that we shall know the saints and our own dear ones. Heaven is the Christian's fatherland, where we shall see our friends and know them.

The Most Important Member of the Family

IS the baby in the cradle—the most important to you—the most important to the nation.

Do you know how to take care of your baby in the best possible way? Do you know how to give him the best possible chance to grow up healthy and useful?

Your baby is of such value to the nation that a committee of some of the most prominent physicians in the United States have written a little book on "The Care of the Baby."

A Book on the Baby

that tells how to feed him, bathe him, dress him, weigh him, where he should sleep, how many hours a day he should be in the air, all the things necessary to keep him in the best of health, is about the most useful thing that the mother or father of a baby can own.

All Helping Armenia and Palestine

WITH the continued opening up of Syria, Palestine and Armenia, as the Turks are forced backward, news of suffering and destitution steadily multiplies. Relief organization is being rapidly effected and funds are pouring in from many sources, but the need is very great and will be continuous. There comes a constant stream of cablegrams and letters, detailing the terrible situation and appealing for help.

Dr. F. J. Serimgeour, military head of medical relief in Jerusalem and Bethlehem, writes: "A few days ago when inspecting the cleaning of streets inside the old Damascus gate I heard a voice from the dark recesses of a low arched tunnel running into the foundations of an ancient house. The recess was filthy beyond description and the stench from the refuse of months most offensive. Yet lying on a few rags on the heaps of loose stones which formed a floor was a woman with three small children. She did not speak when she saw me but seemed merely to utter a cry and the children were sobbing. I was able to converse with her in Arabic and she told me that neither she nor her three small infants had tasted food since noon on the previous day and had lain out in the cold for nights. We have had bitter weather and the children were clad in rags and looked blue. For the time I was able to find them bread but we are searching for means of giving more permanent relief to such desperately urgent cases of actual starvation. Some nights ago two of the officers of our staff found a poor boy lying on the ground not far from the Jaffa Gate. He was moaning, but our officers not knowing Arabic were uncertain whether he was injured or ill. However, they got an ambulance and the patient was sent into one of our civil hospitals. There was no doubt as to his condition when we came to examine him; he was a victim of starvation, and all that night our nurses tried to assist his powers of vitality. At first he seemed to rally, but his sufferings had been too prolonged and he sank next afternoon and died from sheer lack of nourishment."

Stephen Trowbridge writes from Cairo: "Reports from very reliable sources have reached me regarding the Lebanon district, and they indicate that the distress has reached the most bitter stages of starvation. By all means reserve a good part of your funds to help the poor people that survive in Syria and farther north just as soon as the ways are opened."

W. Nesbitt Chambers sends on this appeal received by him in Switzerland from Syria: "I beg you very much to help us. We cry to God and beg you. Perhaps there is somebody in Switzerland who will help that our orphans die not from hunger. All things are now three times as dear as in the time before the war, and my funds are exhausted. Two of our orphans left us, saying 'we cannot endure hunger any longer.' My heart bleeds for them because of the place to which they have gone. I beg of you help us. Help us to save these orphans from the grave."

"I send this," Mr. Chambers adds, "as a reminder of the suffering through which not only the destitute are passing, but through which our agents are passing in their endeavors to relieve the distress. This comes from one of our centers, and I have no doubt that supplies have been sent in since it was written. The indications are that a great deal is being done to relieve the distress, but there is a great deal that we are still not reaching."

Cleveland H. Dodge, treasurer of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, announces receipts of $681,618.99 for the month of February, making a total of $8,240,168.92 collected by the Committee for Relief in the Russian Caucasus, Persia and Southern Palestine. The Committee have already cabled $7,210,367.55 to the field.

New apportionments amounting to $955,000 were made at the Executive Committee meeting of March 1st. This money was allotted as follows:

$250,000 for relief in the Russian Caucasus, via Tiflis; $200,000 were sent to Persia, via Teheran; $200,000 to Eastern Armenia and Western Persia, via Tabriz; $150,000 for relief in Asia Minor, via Constantinople; $100,000 for relief in Syria, via Beirut; $50,000 for Palestine, via Jerusalem; and $5,000 to Armenian refugees in Port Said.

Two checks of $70,000 each were received by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief the week ending March 1. One came from the Canadian Sunday Schools, the other from the City of Portland, Oregon.

"Only one man in 25 makes good in the Miller Plant"

By Creating Uniform Builders We Created Uniform Tires

Each Man a Master—Each Tire a Masterpiece

MILLER Tires are known far and wide today as the Uniform Mileage Tires. That means wherever Millers are run under like conditions, they wear the same.

That 99 Millers in 100 outrun standard guarantees.

Of all the some 429 brands on the market, there is no other we know to equal this.

Miller Tires
UNIFORM MILEAGE
GEARED-TO-THE-ROAD

How Miller Succeeded

Such uniformity has been the aim of tire makers for years. For who could tell, when he bought a tire, whether it would run 5000 miles or fail at a thousand?

Miller found the solution—not in machines or methods—but in men.

We discovered that workmen must be uniform or their tires (mostly handwork) can never be.

By training crack squads—a regiment of champions—we reduced the variables in tires to the smallest fraction.

Each Man Rated

When tire builders come here, each one must take our training and then pass our tests.

Then our efficiency experts keep a record of that man and his work.

To pass our inspectors, the tires he builds must reach our 99% grade. If ever a Miller comes back, the builder's score is penalized.

Under this rigid system, only one man in 25 makes good. But those who do are masters all.

Their average efficiency is 96%.

Geared-to-the-Road

There is no excuse longer for buying tires on luck. Miller means certainty. And safety, too, due to the tread that is geared-to-the-road.

Mark how the sharp rubber cogs engage the ground.

A Limited Number

Only about one motorist in 50 will be able to get the Miller Uniform Tires this year.

It takes time to train men to Miller perfection. And even so, but few can ever become masters.

To make sure of securing your season's supply of Millers, you must speak at once.

Only good dealers are authorized to sell them. Find the one in your neighborhood without delay.

Young People's Topics for March 31

Lessons from the Risen Christ's Forty Days

Christian Endeavor and Epworth League Topics. (Easter Meeting.) John 21: 10-17

TWO intervals of forty days, the Saviour knew; one in the wilderness when, after fasting, he hungered and the tempter came, the other after the tomb when he gave to his disciples final instructions and the proof of his divinity which prepared them to preach the Gospel of salvation to the uttermost parts of the earth. Never in all the years of man's search after God has there been another forty days like this, which bridged the time from the resurrection to the ascension. First, Mary, weeping in the garden, heard with joy the loved voice of her Lord and flew on winged feet to bear the message, "He is risen!" Then followed the various appearances, ten in all, including two in the upper room (the second the occasion of Thomas' declaration of returning faith), the appearance to Peter, the appearance on the walk to Emmaus, the appearance on the shores of Galilee, the appearance later to some five hundred, and lastly appearing to the eleven, commissioning them to preach his Gospel in all the world and promising to go with them always even unto the end.

It is probable that our hearts are most closely touched by four of these appearances: the one to Mary, who, having suffered much, having been forgiven much, and having loved much, was the first to see the Lord; the second in the upper room where Thomas lost his doubts in the full flood of complete revelation; the third in the walk to Emmaus, where He was known in the breaking of bread, and the fourth by Galilee, where Peter expiated his three denials in his thrice avowed affection.

"My Lord and my God!" cried Thomas convinced. So we, driven almost to despair by constantly assailing doubt, may cry, when by faith and prayer and the doing of the doctrine, we have proven it of God and have prepared our hearts for the full revelation of the Christ.

How often, in the breaking of bread, we find anew the Saviour's presence! In sharing our loaf we open our hearts, and what a comfort to feel that as we journey he is by our side, the unseen Guest at every meal, the unseen Listener to every conversation, the unseen strength that fortifies our wills and gives us courage to press on.

And our denials! Not as heinous perhaps as Peter's, but just as cowardly and with less provocation. How often, by word or by deed, or by failure to speak and act, we deny the faith we profess. How sweet then the assurance that he will welcome us on the shore of our sea of self, ready to feed our souls, ready to receive our love, ready to commission us to feed his sheep. But let us not get into the easy notion that forgiveness gives warrant for new denials. Peter, forgiven and commissioned on Galilee's shore, never again denied his Lord. Neither judges, jails, nor any device of man nor the devil could again swerve Peter from the pathway of faith and duty.

And yet one more appearance, the last, when he went to be with the Father, and his disciples beheld him taken away out of their sight. "In like manner as he went shall he appear again." Is not that a blessed promise? The other appearances were for the early church, the last will be repeated for the church triumphant. And for this appearance we, who love him today like those of old, are bidden to watch.

The Automobile in War Time

"TAKING over the operation of the railroads by the government will bring further recognition of the passenger car and motor truck as transportation factors," said Alfred Reeves, general manager of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce. "Director General McAdoo is certain to require that more passengers and freight for short distances be carried by motor vehicles and thus relieve railroad congestion at terminal points. With many passenger trains taken off, people must make greater use of motor cars. If the government retains control of the railroads after the war it is almost certain to coordinate the transportation of freight, express and postal matter, all of which pass over the railroads. The Post Office Department will establish motor truck rural mail and parcel post service out of all the larger cities, and motor stage lines and freight service between points on the railroads and towns without rail connection will be developed. This means an enormous development in the use of motor vehicles. The government has already shown its recognition of the possibilities of the motor truck. This is especially true of the Postmaster General. He has installed them in most of the large cities and has recently called for bids for inter-city motor service between New York and Philadelphia, New York and Hartford, Conn., and Detroit and Toledo. He wants Congress to authorize him to establish motor truck parcel post service within fifty miles of each of fifty of the larger cities, and has even offered to take over all the delivery work of the retail dry goods merchants in New York City, proposing to have the stores mail their packages as parcel post matter. Although the presidential proclamation did not mention the express companies, it will become almost necessary to take over their operation also. With the collection, transportation and delivery of mail and express matter in the hands of the government, a natural and very much to be desired additional function will be the collection and delivery of all package freight. This has become a pressing necessity to relieve the confusion and congestion at the freight houses and piers. The coordination of freight, express and mail service will be of immense benefit to the public, will increase the revenue of the railroads and the Post Office, and will incidentally do more than the present war to build up the motor truck manufacturing industry."

ON the American farmer rests the responsibility of feeding the armies in Europe and the civil population of the United States and to a large extent that of England, France, Italy and Belgium. At the same time he is confronted with labor shortage, high wages and increased cost of keeping horses. These conditions make it necessary for him to increase his efficiency and that of his land.

To do this he must use time and labor-saving machinery, said Charles Clifton, president of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce. The tractor affords the farmer means of increasing production without more men or horses. The automobile and truck furnish transportation that is essential to the farmer. With a truck it is practicable to haul a load forty to fifty miles and return the same day. This is important in view of the freight congestion. The speed of the truck enables the farmer to take advantage of dry weather, when roads are in good condition. It permits him to get benefit of market conditions when prices are high. Every passenger automobile means at least one horse dispensed with. Each horse requires five acres of land. By the car, the farmer can devote five acres to raising staples for human consumption. A truck takes the place of at least one team, and will do the work of five or six horses. This will release ten to thirty acres for the support of three to ten human beings.

Which Do Boys Like Better?

Puffed Rice or Flour Foods? — Ask Them

You know the need for whole-grain foods, with their minerals and vitamins. But do you daily practice the ideal way to serve them?

Graham muffins and rice croquettes are nearly whole-grain foods. But note how they differ from Puffed Grains.

In Puffed Rice and Wheat every food cell is exploded. Every granule is fitted to digest. So the body gets from Puffed Grains all that Nature stored there.

Puffed Grains are like bubbles—airy, thin and flaky. Their flimsy crispness makes them most enticing. They taste like nut confections. You can serve them morning, noon and night. Children never get enough. And they never tax the stomach.

Puffed Grains supply whole-grain food all day long, and in many forms. At breakfast one eats them with sugar and cream, or mixed with any fruit. For luncheon or supper they are floated in bowls of milk. Between meals children eat them dry like peanuts. They are used in candy making, as wafers in soups, as garnish for ice cream.

So users of Puffed Grains may get whole-grain food in plenty. And in a form where every atom feeds.

Puffed Rice Corn Puffs Puffed Wheat

Each 15c Except in Far West

These are not mere tidbits. They are Prof. Anderson's scientific grain foods. The grains get an hour of fearful heat, then they are shot from guns. A hundred million steam explosions occur in every kernel. Every food cell is blasted so digestion can instantly act.

No other form of wheat, rice or corn compares with Puffed Grains as hygienic food. Serve all of them in plenty.

Is the Food Administration Worth While?

Not that the cost of living has been materially reduced—that was beyond the power of the Food Administration. But the people ought to realize from what they have been saved by the prevention of profiteering, speculation and hoarding through the introduction of the licensing system. This is the only means by which retail prices can be influenced and extortion checked. When you read of wholesale merchants who have been put out of business for extortion or hoarding, or letting carloads rot, you may know that the Food Administration is doing all in its power to protect the consumers and make prices as reasonable as possible. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been saved to the people. But never forget that this is secondary—that the supreme object and purpose of the Food Administration is to secure the substitution and saving and reduction of consumption necessary to get wheat, meat, sugar and fats over to the armies and the Allies.

Again, the organization has been perfected until it spreads its network over the entire country. Through the policy of decentralization Federal Food Administrators have been appointed in all the states, with public information directors, county administrators, and the means necessary to carry food conservation into every local district and family. This leaves the broad policies and the direction where it must be, at the center, and distributed the agencies so that local conditions can be met and success secured for the whole.

I have said nothing of production, because that is too large a subject. It was settled for 1917 before the Food Administration was born. Careful plans of stimulation have been laid for this year. One thing is certain, that the home or kitchen garden will be a great aid. Every family that can possibly raise its own vegetables and fruit should do so. A pig in every available back yard is one of the suggestions. The boys and girls can do their bit. The churches can go into cooperative canning of vegetables raised in the home gardens, and lay up a supply to be given to the needy during the coming winter—for we must expect the food conditions to be more severe. This will be true even if the war ends this summer. The peoples will still have to be fed, and we are the storehouse.

Is it worth while? The Food Administration's work is essential to winning the war, and that is our first and greatest task, from which nothing should divert us. But its work goes much deeper than that in its effects. It is a national educator in conserving the nation's health as well as its food supply. It is serving a moral and religious end, as surely as a physical requirement. Many things will be different and better after this war—and one of the things will be the food habits.

All of us therefore should take an interest in food conservation. Do your part to help. Do not grumble at the "fifty-fifty" purchase plan or any other. Practice substitution, saving, whatever is necessary. Be cheerful and not critical. Realize that we have come to no hardship—to nothing that would measure up against the privation and suffering and heartbreak of the French woman or the Italian, to say nothing of Belgian or Armenian men, women and children. Prices are high. They are bound to be in time of war; do not charge that against the Food Administration. Appreciate the things it has accomplished, and the steady purpose animating all its activities. Realize that food conservation is not a fitful fad but a fateful fact, involving both national preservation and international obligation; that every slice of white bread saved or not eaten here may feed a hungry child abroad; that the hand stretched out from the American table reaches to the trenches or tables in France; and that by following the Home Card requests of the Food Administration, each one is really helping to win the war for liberty and righteousness.

The Food Administration is not afraid to show its teeth to lawbreakers. Several distributing agencies were heavily penalized in January for violations of the Administration's regulations. Three unlicensed retail grocers in Pittsburgh—M. Shapiro, B. Block, and Sam Gehman—have had their supplies of licensed food cut off by order of the Food Administration, as a result of unjust and unreasonable charges for food commodities. S. R. Jennings, Shreveport, La., lost his license as a dealer in cottonseed meal and eake through failure to make delivery on advanced contracts. The Tidewater Tie & Lumber Co., Newport News, Va., licensed to deal in foodstuffs, suffered the same fate. The Food Administration showed that its license was merely a cloak for the operations of Lester Bros., also of Newport News, whose license had been revoked in December. The license of I. Swirsky & Son, wholesale grocers of New Haven, Conn., was revoked on January 28. They had been found guilty of extracting exorbitant prices for sugar. Louis Hoffman, of New York, lost his license on January 31, after having been found guilty on similar charges. Promises that sugar would be given away with theater tickets caused the Food Administration to suspend, for the entire month of February, the license of D. Noehinson, wholesale grocer of Paterson, N. J., who had sold 400 pounds of sugar to the manager of the theater. The Clio Oil and Fertilizer Co., in Clio, S. C., lost its license because it had hoarded cotton seed. Canton, Ohio, branch of the General Baking Co. was forced to donate $3,000 to the war funds of the Young Men's Christian Association, Red Cross, etc., because its manager had sold 2,800 pounds of sugar to 28 employees, and had made other sales in unreasonable quantities.

How to Make "Victory Bread"

"VICTORY BREAD" is the name chosen for the breads and rolls that contain one-fifth or more cereal other than wheat. Under regulation, bakers are not permitted to sell any except this mixed cereal bread, and are required to observe the "Victory Bread" substitutions.

This happy name can be applied to sweetbreads, crackers, biscuits, cookies, cakes and pies that contain one-third more of these substitutes, and to batter cakes and waffles that contain three-fourths of substitutes. The baker, like the housewife who buys her cereals on the new 50-50 plan, must run his bread-making on a limited amount of wheat flour, but the great demand for wheat-saving breads insures the sale not only of "Victory Bread," but of breads containing an even higher percentage of wheat-flour substitute than is required under regulation.

In one respect the housekeeper has a decided advantage over the baker. He must produce a bread that will stand twelve to twenty-four hours' delay and handling before reaching the table, while her homemade bread can be transferred from stove to table in a few seconds. Women will no doubt use this advantage to produce 100 per cent. wheat-saving breads, such as corn bread and buckwheat cakes, which could well be termed "Victory Plus" breads.

Housekeepers will be interested in the following list of substitutes that reflect in a strikingly interesting fashion the diversified farming of the nation and various breadmaking experiments:

Bran, shorts, middlings.
Milo flour and similar flours and meals.

Corn flour, corn meal, corn grits, hominy.

Edible corn starch, barley flour, rolled oats, oat meal.

Rice, rice flour, buckwheat flour, potato flour, sweet potato flour.

Bean meal, peanut meal, cassava, taro and banana flours, and other products of similar nature.

What new breads will housekeepers contrive from them? Report your successes to the Christian Herald or to the Food Administration at Washington.

22 Million Families in the United States

4 Cups of Wheat Flour to the Pound

If each family used 4 cups of flour less per week, the saving would be 22 million pounds or 112,244 barrels every week.

The greatest help housekeepers can give to win the war is to make this saving and it can be done by using this recipe in place of white flour bread.

Corn Meal Biscuits

$\frac{3}{4}$ cup scalded milk	$\frac{3}{4}$ teaspoon salt
1 cup corn meal	1 cup white flour
2 tablespoons shortening	4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder

Save $\frac{1}{4}$ cup of the measured flour for board. Pour milk over corn meal, add shortening and salt. When cold, add sifted flour and baking powder. Roll out lightly on floured board. Cut with biscuit cutter and bake in greased pan fifteen to twenty minutes.

Jesus Our Example in Service

International Sunday School Lesson for March 31. Phil 2:1-11

A Review Lesson (Mark, chapters 1 to 6)

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE have completed six chapters of Mark this quarter. Now as we review the fruits of our study we can surely agree with the men who selected Paul's great sentence in Phil. 2:5-8 as the key text for our summary today. Read it with your study notes of Mark before you—Paul's declaration of the Mind of Christ. The Unselfish Christ of whom Paul speaks is the same person whom Mark pictured for us. Mark received his information about Jesus from Peter, we believe, and we know how different Peter and Paul were in their thinking and writing. Yet each gained all his inspiration from the same great Exemplar. In him all Christians are one, however diverse their duties and their gifts. And to him all worthy guides point, even to him who went about doing good.

I. Self-Regardless in Consecration

At the beginning we have a picture of the quiet unknown man from Nazareth humbly stooping in Jordan for the baptism of John, gladly submitting to a rite of consecration which seemed to him valuable for the future of the Kingdom. Then we see the struggle with temptation and the victory won by utter devotion to the will of God regardless of any appeal to self-satisfaction or to self-glory, even when presented with skilful quotation of the Messianic Scriptures. This is the same Jesus whom Paul describes as obedient, a word that expands in meaning in the light of the Gospel till it sums up complete and self-regardless consecration. Here is our Example. He cannot be followed by those who will withhold anything in their dedication of a life to God. And there are so many of us who are holding something back. "Lord, I will follow thee, but" there is something that I reserve the right to consider paramount to your claims. There are some of us who put limits upon our consecration, but as a matter of fact a limited consecration is no consecration at all. He would be no missionary who consecrated himself to work in Africa on the coast but under no circumstances would think of going into the interior. In the early days of New England, the churches once had a Half-way Covenant, which a man could take without committing himself before the world as an out-and-out Christian! Fortunately the thing didn't last. Even while it was operative, it was understood that no one who had taken only the Half-way Covenant should participate in the communion. They realized that fellowship with God and Christ depends upon wholesouled devotion. If we have any "half-way" church members today, it surely is because selfishness of some sort mars their service. Back of all genuine service is consecration to a cause. Of this truth Jesus is a supreme example.

II. Self-Effacing in Teaching

Mark presents us with a self-effacing Teacher who speaks much of the Kingdom and leaves it to us to exalt the King. When he refers to himself he merges his identity with the whole human family of God and calls himself the Son of man, rather than the Son of God. "He suffered not the demons to speak, because they knew him." To the cured leper he said, "See thou say nothing to any man." So tremendous was the impress of his personality that the natural question constantly arose, "Who then is this?" But Jesus preferred to say naught of himself, so that gradually his disciples for themselves identified him as Messiah and Lord. Of course "he could not be hid," but there was no trace of self-consciousness and nothing of the poseur about him. As an actual fact what he was spoke even louder than what he said, just as Emerson held is always the case, either for good or for evil.

So he is our example in our teaching:

indefatigable, patient, tactful, suiting his message to the minds of his hearers, and always making much of the message and saying naught of the Messenger, yet somehow living out the truth he taught. I think that the Church abounds still in self-effacing teachers. Remember the protest of William Carey, when hailed and honored by the church at home. He objected to so much talk about Dr. Carey, Dr. Carey, and so little about Dr. Carey's Master. Carey utterly forgot self in his teaching, but India saw Christ in his countenance nevertheless. Just so our schools and churches are full of ministers and teachers who never think of self while they expound the truth of the Gospel. But others need to think of their Example and to be more like Christ in this respect.

III. Self-Forgetful in Ministering to Need

There was only one thing that could draw Christ from his all-important work of teaching the Word of God. That was the cry of human need for aid. He never could resist the call for compassion. What drafts it made upon his time and strength, as he moved through throngs healing the sick, calming the demented, cheering the distressed. How weary Jesus was, drained in body and spirit from the grapple with the things that hinder and hurt men. Sometimes "they could not so much as eat bread," because of the throng that clamored for his care. When he sought a brief respite the people pursued him. But how cheerfully he gave up his vacation and ministered unto them!

His example lives on in Christian physicians, nurses, and social workers without number. He stands again surrounded by the suffering poor in Judson King's account of medical work in the Congo in "Missions" for February. Worn by the day's demands the missionary is about to retire, when he is summoned on a case of life and death which keeps him up all night. In the morning the vanguard of the next village's representatives await to importune him to hurry on.

What awful need cries for Christlike service in our time! Yet some of our Christian people still slumber in their self-centered routine. They must hear the challenge to awake to serve—whether it be in the ever-present avenues of charity at home or in the new endeavors made necessary by worldwide war.

IV. Unselfish in Sharing His Mission

Some well-meaning workers make the mistake of trying to carry the whole load alone. Some seem to think that they alone are able to do the thing that counts. Jesus Christ was free from the subtle temptation to monopolize his own mission that has made men so often cranks and fanatics instead of builders of the future. Divine and unique as he was, he early planned to share the enterprise with the ordinary men who surrounded him. He was fundamentally coöperable. He knew how to utilize the talents of inferior people, and to impart to them the glory of his cause. He gladly accepted the fellowship of the humblest, giving to them a share in the founding on earth of that Kingdom which God himself had sent him to begin.

Paul was like Christ in welcoming coöperation. He delighted to push forward his collaborators while he stood in the background. He rejoiced to see his Timothy and Titus and Archippus assuming important places in the Church. His letters teem with personal references ascribing honor to others, as in Philippians he bestows five glorious words on Epaphroditus of Philippi, "my brother, and fellow worker, and fellow soldier, and your apostle and minister."

That is a successful Bible school in which every scholar feels himself a partner in the enterprise. That is a successful church where pastor and officers know how to make every member responsible as much as they. That is a successful society where the president knows how to lead and to develop leaders as well.

The Spiritual Beauty of Humility

Humility is of the very essence of unselfishness. The proud can scarcely put self to one side at all. It is a lovely thing to see a really great soul "in honor preferring others." In fact, true humility is shown by contact with inferiors—it is pretty easy to be humble before those who outclass you. But Jesus showed a beautiful consideration to those who were not at all worthy to be compared with him, and a gentle respect and deference to those who were being overborne by the world at large. He emptied himself, he made himself of no reputation, he humbled himself—"wherefore God highly exalted him."

Haven't the greatest souls you have known been Christlike in displaying a humble spirit? It is only the little souls that are jealous of their prerogatives. One of the wonderful things about Thomas à Kempis's Imitation of Christ is the genuine humility of that true saint of God. I love to read his "prayer of a humble and a contrite spirit." In it he says:

"O Lord my God, who art supremely to be loved, remember my poverty; that I am a frail man, not a holy angel; a great sinner, not an innocent lamb; one that prayeth coldly, not one that gloweth in contemplation; and therefore I am not worthy to be counted, nor to appear, nor to be named, among the number of thy devout worshippers."

Thomas à Kempis also testified to the importance of humility in the Christian order by writing in one of his pithy chapters on that theme: "Better it is to have a small portion of good sense with humility, and a slender understanding, than great treasures of science with vain self-complacency."

The Joy of Service

Those of us who have the privilege of teaching will find it possible to classify all our lesson topics and golden texts under the four aspects of selfless service seen in Christ which we have so briefly noted. And have we not already caught the note of deep underlying joy in the soul of the Christ of God? The joy of service is a holy joy. It has a substantial quality that the world's pleasures absolutely lack. No matter how hard the task, rather indeed because the task is both difficult and needful, the consecrated worker enters into the joy of his Lord. The motto of the crown of England is "I serve."

In Africa and Asia

A REVIVAL has begun in Wad Madani through the ministrations of Rev. Ibrahim Girgis, Sudan secretary of the World's Sunday School Association. He also spoke to the classes in the government school. Mr. Girgis tells the following incident: "The chief clerk in the railway office in Wad Madani attended the meetings held every night during my stay in the town. He used to come earlier than the hour on which the service commenced, and began to bring others with him. Evidences of Christ and the new life appeared in his face and in his mind, though he did not publicly join the church. He asked me to get him Bible study helps and sermons. When I left the town many came to see me off. One man caught my hand, led me aside and said, 'I wish to tell you about the work of God's grace in the chief clerk. Last night after the meeting he came and spent a long time in our house in prayer. He is resolved to serve God even if he has to leave his government post in fulfilling his purpose.'"

In China the Sunday School Union is carrying forward very definite evangelistic work. Particular work was accomplished in two Summer Conferences in Peking, Tientsin, Hangehow, Nanking and Shanghai. The Sunday school, church and Y. M. C. A. leaders are linked in this work. The "Adult Bible Class Movement" will receive great impetus from such campaigns.

Willard Storage Battery

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation

“Is There Really Much Difference in Batteries?”

The answer is easy, if you distinguish between the big things, on which battery life and efficiency depends, and the little details, which are less important individually, though taken all together they make considerable difference between high-class, well-built batteries on the one hand and cheap batteries on the other.

Let's consider the little things first—strength and durability of box and jars, size of terminals, quality of sealing compound, careful selection, testing and mixing of the lead oxides for plates, design of grid, and so on.

Which battery has the biggest and highest average of all of them?

Isn't it logical to suppose it is the battery which is built by the largest and oldest builder of automobile starting and lighting batteries—with the widest experience and most complete facilities?

—the battery which has year after year been used as standard equipment by about 85% of all car-builders?

Such leadership could not be established and maintained except by superior quality in every detail of design, material and workmanship.

And now consider the big difference—one on which the life of the current-producing plates is directly dependent—INSULATION.

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation

The “Still Better Willard” has Threaded Rubber Insulation between its plates.

It is one of those rare discoveries that go to the very heart of the battery—transforming it into a newer, still better product.

It is a thing battery engineers wanted for years—a really practical hard rubber protection for battery plates.

All sorts of ways had been tried to devise a rubber insulation that would preserve the superior insulating qualities of rubber without either decreasing the voltage or increasing battery size and weight.

The problem was to find the proper method of allowing the battery solution to pass through the insulation, this being necessary to assure the proper voltage.

Willard found the answer by piercing the hard rubber insulation with 196,000 tiny threads.

The results have been so remarkable, the demand for the Still Better Willard has been so insistent—that you owe it to yourself to get the facts at first hand.

Call at the Service Station and let me show you the battery. Meantime, write Willard Storage Battery Company, Cleveland, for their interesting free booklet A-1, “The Story of 196,000 Little Threads.”

The Head Surgeon's Patient

A True Story of the War by HEDGAR PLUVIANES

IT was in a military hospital, in an out-of-the-way corner of Normandy. This hospital had been rather hastily organized, and everything was on a modest scale, as were so many things at the beginning of a war for which no preparation whatever had been made. Nearly every week arrived a convoy of seriously wounded, directly from the front.

Oh, the sad sights, in the gray, damp November mornings or the misty twilight; the long, slow trains, carefully stopping at the obscure little station! The white forms carried away, the bandaged heads, the pale, weary faces, all in a line toward the ambulance near by, between the leafless trees. And the great, solemn silence, enveloping the ominous scene.

In a snowy bed a big wounded soldier is moaning. His hard, sour face has a shut, defiant air, mixed with anxiety. His leg has been pierced in several places, and some bullets are still there. The head surgeon has gently told him, this very first morning, that he was not sure the leg could be saved.

"But of course I will do my very best, you know that, my boy," he had added, looking at him with his kind brown eyes. "You must not give up hope. I only warned you in case it becomes urgent, and so that it may not be too great a shock to you." And he had passed on.

After the surgeon's visit, the wounded man asked the nurse: "Who is this doctor? I seem to know his face."

"It is quite possible," she answered. "You may, in any case, have seen his photograph. He is Doctor X from Paris." And she named the most famous French surgeon of the day.

The soldier opened his eyes wide. "Do you mean that he stays here? In this small, unknown place?"

The infirmière smiled. "What does that mean to him? Men are men, everywhere. . . ."

THE next morning the wounded man waited impatiently for the doctor. When the dressing was done, with the minutest care, in the gentlest way, the soldier said rather brusquely, to hide his emotion: "Monsieur le Major, have you seen my livret?"

"No, boy, I have not seen it." "Then you don't know that I am a légionnaire?"

[In the French army, the doctors alone have the title of major. The livret is the book of civil and military identity carried by each soldier. The légionnaires are a regiment of men who have been condemned to punishment, either in their civil or military life.]

"How does that affect me?" said the Major.

"Well, I wondered if you would be so kind to me if you knew what I am and had read all about my condemnations."

The great surgeon smiled and pinched the soldier's cheek. "My poor boy, I don't care what you were. Now I know you are a soldier of France; you have fought valiantly; you are wounded. Why should I look at your livret? It is not my business. I am not a gendarme!" He was laughing, standing there, imposing and erect, gathering his tools; he added brightly: "No, I am no gendarme. I am only your friend. Good morning, lad. You may perhaps keep this naughty leg of yours, if you are very good and quiet. . . ."

When he had gone, the légionnaire, who could not turn to the wall, covered his face with a newspaper that was on his bed and, underneath, indulged in the first tears he had shed since he was a little boy of twelve.

THE days passed. He watched narrowly all around him: nurses, doctors, and, above all, the head surgeon, to discover any sign of disgust or of disdain toward him. He could see none.

He knew that in the bed next to him the son of a noble French house was suffering like himself. Could it be possible that this young man of high birth, great fortune and honorable past would receive no better attention than a poor wretch who had been many times in prison, and had only just begun to be sorry for it? Yet, incredible as it seemed, it was so.

In spite of the most attentive watching, he could see no difference, except, perhaps, on his own side, a little more kindness, tinged with pity, in the famous surgeon's voice, when he personally dressed the wounds every day.

Then the soldier thought of his motherless childhood, without love or caresses; of his first fall into evil ways through the bad examples of older and wicked friends. He thought of his long, weary days and nights in prison: his heart full of hatred and rebellion against those who had put him there, and never the least feeling of repentance. He thought of the despising look of good people when he came out, the difficulty of obtaining work, the poverty, the loneliness. And then, as an only way, the next fall into still uglier sins. . . . And through it all, nobody had ever been kind to him, had ever loved him. . . . He had become an outcast, until he had come here, where one of the greatest men of the country had called him "my boy," and said he was "his friend!"

TIME went on only too rapidly. The leg was saved, though still stiff. The soldier's health was excellent. The hour had come to leave this hospital, to give his place to another.

The morning he went away he asked a private interview to say good-by to the head surgeon. He found him in his laboratory and thanked him heartily for all his care and kindness.

The famous doctor stood up and put both his hands on the young man's shoulders. "My child," he said gently, "I have a favor to ask of you."

"Of me?" echoed the soldier. "Oh, Monsieur le Major, what can that be?"

The surgeon looked very serious and fatherly. "Promise me to live, from this day, a different life. I don't know what you have been guilty of, and I don't wish to know. But I want you to promise me to become an honest and good man, with God's help."

The big soldier, with the defiant air, who had been, perhaps, a redoubtable "Apache," bowed his head, and in a childlike gesture leaned it against the great surgeon's arm. Then he burst into tears, broken down by the man who had revealed to him the possibility of a new life. He wept over the wasted years, his dark past.

At this moment an assistant, entering the room, saw a strange, unexpected scene.

The celebrated scientist had passed both his arms around the légionnaire's shoulders and was kissing his forehead. He also had tears in his eyes, but the man who until then had believed himself despised and fallen forever was suddenly transfigured under this paternal embrace. At this supreme hour a divine spark had lit in his dark soul a wonderful fire that nothing could ever extinguish. He felt he could, indeed, live another life. God had not forsaken his poor soul, since a good man had loved him and gathered him to his arms.

And he thought of a simple story he had heard when he was a little child . . . the story of a prodigal son, who had come home to his father. . . .

Love had done it for him also!

Sailors' Savings in War Time

THE annual report of the Seamen's Church Institute of New York City shows that in 1917 the Institute received the unprecedented sum of $533,459.24 in seamen's wages, for safekeeping and transmission. The pay of the sons of the sea has been larger than ever before, on account of bonuses offered to both sailors and firemen on vessels passing through the U-boat zones. Men who were getting $30 a month before the war are now drawing $60, which, with a bonus of fifty per cent. for hazardous trips, has brought their earnings up to $90 a month. Rev Archibald R. Mansfield, D. D., the superintendent, said that sailors and firemen are especially prudent these days about conserving their cash and sending it to their families, or putting it in the Institute's bank.

CORD TIRES

The Men Who Serve You

THE Pullman car employees are in a distinctive sense the representatives of the Company. They are continually on dress parade; their conduct is a matter of supreme importance.

Each Pullman car has its porter, and on every train is a Pullman Conductor, in charge of all porters on the train. Either is at your service throughout the journey for information or to supply any special wants within his power.

Courtesy and thoughtful attention are among the most important things that the Pullman Company has to sell; and they must be of high quality. A careful record is kept of the manner in which each employee does his work; and rewards of extra pay are given for perfect records.

It is noteworthy that twenty-five per cent of the eight thousand porters in the Pullman employ have been for over ten years in the service of the Company; and some have been in its employ for forty years. Pensions are provided for men retired from active service and provision is also made for sick relief for all car employees.

There are no rules for passengers save those which conduce to the comfort of all travelers; but the rules for employees, made in the interest of the passengers, are many and minute.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THERE is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear." Why should a child still cry when it is folded tight in mother's arms? Does it not trust? The very closeness of its snuggling tells of trust. Yet it sobs on until caresses have brushed fear aside, and love has steadied unstrung nerves. In many things we are like children. Assured of God's love, knowing that he careth for us, we are nevertheless in panic before the threat of suffering or trouble and cry out that he has forgotten us, that we are lost. Even when we climb by faith into the very arms of the Father, we sometimes fear lest in our unworthiness we shall be cast out. How foolish! It is not our unworthiness but his righteousness that weights the scale; not our misdeeds but his love; not our deservings but his forgiving. Can we not trust him who loves us to lead us safely on through all of life? Shall we who love God go on, greeting each day with trembling, veiling each noonday sun in expectation of evil, locking out the shades of evening in fear? Perfect love casteth out fear. His love is perfect toward us. When our love is perfected in him there will be no fear. And when shall we be better brought to perfection than in the sacred hour of prayer? Let us then clear away the dust of neglect from our altar of prayer and lose our fears in the communion of the secret place.

F. C. C. had tried every known cure for the liquor habit, except one—effectual fervent prayer, which, the apostle James tells us, availeth much. Then one dear friend, who had stuck to him through thick and thin and through right and wrong, pleaded with him to write to the Prayer League. Now he is free from the clutches of the fiend, and finds that all he had lost in the spiritual and material world has been added unto him. He has moved into a large city for the more successful prosecution of his business, and now asks the League to pray God to give him strength to resist the temptations which abound in his new home.

Mrs. A. M. R. praises God for bodily healing, and asks for blessing, both spiritual and temporal, on her mother and her husband.

B. M. writes from England to tell of the air raids and prays that a daughter may be able to overcome her great fear. The family has been wonderfully preserved so far, as only one bomb has been dropped near them.

W. F. writes from a community in which the church, organized fifty-five years ago, has fallen on evil days. It has a membership of about eight persons, a Sunday school almost deserted, and a pastor who works for $250 a year and supports himself by teaching the public school. But it has a summer resort near by, with a large dance hall and well-attended Sunday baseball. The church had one effective revival forty years ago. Now W. F. asks the counsel of old experienced Christian workers, and especially prayer for a baptism of the Holy Spirit, for which a remnant in this church is waiting.

C. A., now over seventy, is worried by the memory of the sins of his youth, and over the fact that when he prays his prayers "don't seem to mount very high." The League will add its prayers to those of this brother. Now our brother should remember that Jesus came to save just such as he was, and that our feeling about it is not what counts, but the great fact, and our faith which lays hold of the fact. We are saved by faith, and our prayers mount heavenward on the wings of His love. He also longs to be cured of deafness if it be God's will.

F. J. D. makes three definite requests for prayer: "First, for ourselves, that our lives may be brought into harmony with God's will; second, for our friends and enemies throughout the world and the speedy end of this war with a righteous peace; third, for those who know not God, or, if knowing him, have no regard for his claims upon them."

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Elgin, Texas; Elk Point, S. D.; Paoli, Ind.; Greenwood, Canada; Coles, Ill.; Jewell, Kan.; Poplar Ridge, N. Y.; Hamlin, Texas; Prescott, Canada; Franklin, Ind.; Pine Bluff, N. C.; Edmeston and Garrattsville, N. Y.; Kirkwood, Mo.; Garfield, N. J.; Eugene, Ore.; Chicago, Ill.; Airlie, Ore.; Anglum, Mo.; Salem, Iowa (that many may be saved during revival); Libby, Mont. (that many may be saved during revival); Sentinel Butte, N. D. (at the Rocky Butte Church); Philadelphia, Pa. (for a gracious outpouring of God's Holy Spirit in the M. E. Church); Chicago, Ill. (for the success of Billy Sunday's meetings to be held next month).

R. H. asks prayer that Rev. John Cameron may be sent to Garrattsville, N. Y.; Mrs. M. H. A., Airlie, Ore. (that an evangelist may be sent to the community).

Eight parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; F. E. B., that mother's mind may be restored; six friends, that sisters' minds may be restored; nine friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

Mrs. M. asks prayer that husband's, son's and own sight may be restored; four friends that mothers' sight may be restored; Mrs. R. B. G., that husband's sight may be restored; sixteen friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives or friends.

Mrs. L. M. asks prayer that son's hearing may be restored; Mrs. A. B., that son's hearing may be restored; two wives, their husbands'; Mrs. W. A. F., that mother's hearing may be restored; A. W., that sister's hearing may be restored; Mrs. C. M. H., that Mr. S's hearing may be restored; nineteen friends, that their own hearing may be restored.

Sixty-seven friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing; including B. M., Hampstead, England, for safety from the air raids.

Twenty-four friends ask prayer for special blessing for others; including E. B. C., for the safe return of all our boys.

Six parents ask prayer that sons may be cured of the liquor habit; four wives, their husbands'; Mrs. J. O. F., that an uncle may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. E. H., that nephew may be cured of the liquor habit; B. M., that a friend may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. A. E. S., that son may be cured of the drug habit; I. H. N., that a young wife may be cured of the drug habit.

One hundred and twenty-three friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. S. B. R., that son may be cured of cancer; F. H. B., that wife may be fully restored to health and strength; Mrs. E. A. Z., that daughter may be healed without an operation; O. B., that daughter may be restored to health and regain the power of speech; E. R., that a little girl may regain the use of limbs; M. A., that a pastor may be restored to health; Mrs. D. A. G., that husband may pass safely through an operation; Mrs. F. N. F., that husband's operation may be successful; one hundred and eight friends, for healing of self.

Forty-one parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty-seven wives, their husbands'; sixty-six, other relatives and friends.

Thirty-six friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Fifty friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including three friends asking prayer for world-wide peace; Mrs. E., that we may have a good rain at Randlett, Okla.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. L. D., Syracuse, N. Y.; D. M., Westport, Calif.; Mrs. L. H., Llano, Texas; Mrs. V. C. D., Leslie, Mich.; A. T. M., Corvallis, Ore.; Mrs. M. M., Sacramento, Calif.; Mrs. J. H., Marshfield, Mo.; F. S., St. Marys, Ohio; M. W. B., Port Carbon, Pa.; Mrs. W. A. M., Brunswick, Me.; A. J. M., Gleggery, Canada; Miss R. W., Laurens, S. C.; A. H., Princeville, Ill.; E. H., Waupaca, Wis.; Mrs. R., Northville, S. D.; F. E. S., Morning Sun, Ohio; Mrs. E. M. M., Canandaigua, N. Y.; Mrs. E. R. H., Ingersoll, Okla.; A Woman, Winsted, Conn.; Mrs. H. W. Stevenson, Liberty, Texas; Mrs. N. D. K., Concord, N. H.; S. D. L., Alden, Ill.; Mrs. E. W. J., Little Rock, Ark.; Mrs. M. S. B., Palmyra, Mo.; M. N., Barton, Vt.; M. C., Mobile, Ala.; Mrs. C. M. F. M., Warrenburg, Mo.; Mrs. G. M., Spearfish, S. D.; Mrs. E. M. L., Stouchburg, Pa.

You Can Be So Well

Do you know, ill health or chronic ailments, in nine out of ten cases are due to improper food, poor circulation, insufficient exercise, incorrect breathing and incorrect posture. Remove those unnatural conditions and your ailments vanish. This may surprise you, but I am doing it daily; I have done it for eighty thousand women.

Without Drugs

I will send you letters of endorsement from eminent physicians and tell you how I would treat you. Physicians endorse my work—their wives and daughters are my pupils. Don't let writing a letter stand between you and GOOD HEALTH, ANIMATION, Correct Weight and a perfect figure. Write me now—today—while this subject is uppermost. If you will tell me in confidence your height, weight, and your ailments, I will tell you if I can help you.

An Epoch Making Prohibition Book

WE told our readers editorially how complete and convincing a book Dr. Iglehart's "King Alcohol Dethroned" was. The best critics of the country, after reading the book, agree with this opinion. Mr. William Jennings Bryan in his Commoner, Dr. Albert Shaw in his two-page editorial review of the book in the Review of Reviews for January, Dr. Lynch, in a page editorial comment in his Christian Work, and many others, unequivocally and enthusiastically commend the book as being a wonderful production. A number of them say it is by all odds the ablest anti-alcohol book that has ever been written. Dr. Willis Fletcher Johnson, who has had an honored place in the editorial department of the New York Tribune for thirty-nine years, thinks so and says so in the issue of the Tribune of February 23 in these words: "There have been bigger books published on the subject, with more flamboyant and melodramatic exploitations of 'horrible examples,' but we should doubt if there is one in existence better calculated to convince the reader and to serve as the campaign manual of anti-booze warfare than this scholarly, restrained, but cogent and poignant volume, which appeals to reason and not to passion, to science and not to superstition, and at every turn to impregnable truth." The Christian Herald from its beginning, when there were almost no prohibitionists, until now, has been a sane but radical enemy of the liquor traffic. It is with peculiar pride that this paper has given to the public Dr. Iglehart's "King Alcohol Dethroned," which Senator Shoppard, who had charge of prohibition legislation in the Senate, says is an epoch-making book, whose influence in the final settlement of the prohibition question will be incalculable.

We will send a copy of "King Alcohol Dethroned," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.40. Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

Protecting the Soldiers

THOSE who have felt that our boys in uniform were not sufficiently safeguarded against the liquor evil or who have been disquieted by rumors of regulations being relaxed will be glad to know that a revision of President Wilson's regulations of last May prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor to soldiers, which makes it an offense punishable by fine or imprisonment to give, serve or deliver as well as sell liquor to an army officer or enlisted man, has been announced by Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman of the War Department Commission on Training Camp Activities, who denies published reports to the effect that the original ruling had been relaxed, declaring the revised regulation much more stringent in its provisions than the old one.

The primary object of the new regulations is to stamp out the illicit traffic in liquor or bootlegging around army camps. Under the old provisions of the President's order, only the sale to officers or enlisted men in uniform was prohibited outside of zones. There was no prohibition against giving, serving or delivering it to a soldier in a private home or elsewhere outside such zones. In this way bootleggers and unscrupulous liquor dealers outside these zones were enabled to evade the law without violating it technically.

Chairman Fosdick, in making public the new order, has asked the cooperation of liquor dealers and café proprietors in preventing all sales of liquor to be consumed off the premises. This plan has been adopted in San Antonio, Texas, and Alexandria, La., and has resulted in immediate improvement because it cuts off the supply of liquor to bootleggers. Many liquor dealers' associations and individual license holders have already put such a rule in effect, and Mr. Fosdick states that the government may make such action compulsory in certain cities, unless conditions in those places materially improve.

Among the Workers

THE Moody Bible Institute Colportage Association, Chicago, during the past five months has forwarded nearly 100,000 religious books and Scriptures to the various camps, forts and war ships.

TO give liberally of her talents for nearly a half-century is the record of Mrs. Nancy Price Krohn, of North McGregor, Iowa. Mrs. Krohn has often been called "the song-bird of the Mississippi," living as she does in a vine-clad cottage on its shore. When sixteen years of age she began singing in public and arranging church concerts. For forty-five years she was a member of the Methodist choir, and for forty-seven years has missed the song service in only three Protestant funeral services in the town.

THE Bureau of Mines has just issued a chart on the subject of resuscitation from gas asphyxiation, drowning, and electric shock. This chart is suitable for posting at the mines, in police and fire stations, bathing houses, and all industrial establishments in which there is danger from gas asphyxiation, drowning, or electric shock. It shows the Schaefer, or prone, pressure method of artificial respiration, which is the latest and most approved method advocated by eminent physiologists of the country. The bureau is issuing it in the hope of inducing the adoption of this standard method of resuscitation throughout the country and with the hope that the instructions presented may result in the saving of human life. Copies will be sent free of charge to all persons requesting it as long as the edition remains in stock. Address Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

A NEW SERIES OF PROPHETIC INTERPRETATIONS

By Prof. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.
Dean of the Moody Bible Institute

A FEW days ago, an elderly pastor who has been greatly honored by his denomination—one of the largest in this country—and whose eloquent sermons have made him famous, entered the Christian Herald editorial rooms and said: "I want to tell you that for the first time in my life, I preached a sermon last Sunday on the Second Coming. In all my ministry of nearly half a century, I had never once taken this subject. Indeed, like most other pastors, I had regarded it as something theoretical, if not doubtful, and at best so far away as not to be within the domain of practical theology. Now, however, my eyes have been opened. At the request of a friend, I was led to look up all the available references in Scripture to the Second Coming, and in the course of this work there flashed upon me a spiritual illumination such as I had never before experienced. I now see that it is a tremendous error for the Church to neglect this great and inspiring theme, as it has done. It should not be a sealed book. It is true—Jesus is Coming! I found in the New Testament alone nearly 300 verses making either direct or indirect allusion to the Second Coming. I found also that as the First Coming was clearly foreshadowed in the Old Testament prophecies, so the Second Coming is foretold in the New, with equal clearness and far greater emphasis and with divine authority by the voice of Jesus himself, and confirmed by His disciples."

THIS is the new attitude of an astonishingly large number of clergymen in practically all the denominations today. Their eyes have been opened. They see that it is the duty of the Church everywhere to take note of the great events now happening in the world and their relation to prophecy. Dr. Gray's wonderful series of articles in the

has been used as a means to enlighten the understanding of many preachers as well as laymen. In hundreds of pulpits where the Second Coming was rarely or never alluded to in times past, it is now a standard theme, overshadowing all others. The end of the "Times of the Gentiles," the impending return of Israel and the restoration of Palestine, as well as many other events now taking place, indicate that we are in the border-zone of prophetic fulfillment.

IN Dr. Gray's article, in this issue, he deals with "Christ's Future Earthly Reign." With reverent scholarship, he gives an interpretation of this great theme, marshaling all the passages from the Gospels and Epistles in its support. Dr. Gray is not a sensationalist, but he is an illustration of sound scholarship, applied with rare consecration to the greatest theme since the dawn of the Christian era. It will appear in the Christian Herald within the next few weeks, and if we may judge from the multitude of inquiries concerning the series, it will have a nation-wide audience of readers.

"FORTY PROPHETIC WONDERS"

By Rev. MICHAEL BAXTER

WE have ready for delivery that remarkable volume written, many years ago, by the Rev. Michael Baxter, entitled "Forty Prophetic Wonders." This book is known to very few now living, and is remarkable for many things. Dr. Baxter was an enthusiastic student of prophecy, and had collated all the best authorities of his own and preceding times, and they are set forth in his book with his own comment and interpretation. As an example of his perspicacity, it can be stated that among the conclusions he then reached were the following:

1. 1907-1919, Great European wars, beginning 24 to 10 years before the end of the age, including probably a German war or revolution.
2. 1919, The Euphrates (or Turkish Empire) dried up—Turkish power over Judea may notably decrease about the same time.
3. 1919-1925, Great revival among Christians everywhere and preaching of the Advent.
4. 1917-1919, Formation of the Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy foretold in Dan. 2:8.
5. 1922-1929, Jerusalem to be restored and the Temple rebuilt.

Dr. Baxter's book goes much further than this, both before and after the dates indicated. It is the most complete setting forth of Scripture prophecies to be found anywhere. He himself never assumed to fix dates, but assembled the views of eminent students of the subject and gave the average of their computations. It is, in his view, a time of the unfolding of many mysteries, and the outcome of his many years of devotion to the great prophetic themes will have a wonderful fascination for all readers.

His book will be welcomed by all who love the Scriptures, and its influence will be to lead many to take a new view of the meaning of life, and of the great purposes of the Creator and Redeemer for the salvation and purification of the world.

In the Third Bible Picture Study?

OUR Third Study—called the National Bible Picture Study—is out of the preliminary stage now. All 30 pictures have been printed, and they will all be sent you at once, with the Reference Book of Bible verses and the Answer Book. You have until May 31, 1918—just think of that!—to search out the best verses for the pictures. Accept our invitation, and join our helpful home competition today!

How You Will Compete in the National Bible Picture Study

FIRST

Right after supper you will get out the handy little reference book, called International Bible Readings, and be prepared to search through its 2,000 Bible verses for those that most fully fit the 30 pictures.

SECOND

You will spread the 30 pictures out on the table before you, just as you have them spread out before you on these two pages here. Then you will read through the verses in the reference book, comparing them to the pictures.

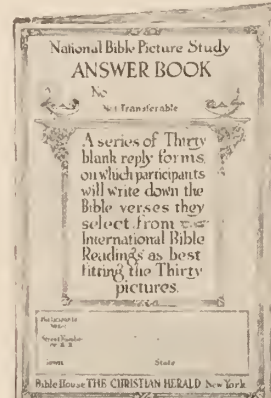

THIRD

You will select the best verses for the 30 pictures, and write your chosen verses in the Answer Book. Lastly, you will sign your name and address on the Answer Book cover, and send it in to the Christian Herald.

What Enjoyment!

Yes, and what solid, lasting Bible study, too! You must order by April 22, 1918, at the latest, but you will have until May 31, 1918, to solve! That time will pass so pleasantly, however, that it will speed by—order at once!

In the Second Bible Picture Study

HOW happy are all those who competed in the Second Bible Picture Study, recently ended! Not only are the cash prize winners glad they entered, but we have many letters from those whose sole prize was that of increased Bible knowledge, greater spiritual understanding and insight—and they realize and declare this is far more precious than the gold. Yet read what two of the prize cash winners say.

WILLIAM N. WYSHAM, Maryland
Winner of 1st Prize, $1,000.00 in cash, in the Second Bible Picture Study.

HERBERT W. LANDIS, Ohio
Winner of 4th Prize, $400.00 in cash, in the Second Bible Picture Study.

THEY'RE JUST FOLKS—SAME AS YOU ARE!

1st PRIZE WINNER Helped by his Wife

YOUR letter enclosing check for $1000.00 has been forwarded to me from my home in Maryland, and in thanking you for it I will also tell you about my method of procedure in taking part in the Contest.

I may say that I took part in the First Contest, but failed even to get one of the smallest prizes. I enjoyed working on it very much, however, and so was glad to have the opportunity of trying again. In the Second Contest I at first determined to send in only one Answer Book, but acting on the advice of the winners in the First Contest, published in the Christian Herald, I sent for a second book at the last moment, incidentally giving pleasure to a friend by subscribing to the "Herald" for her. That second book won the prize.

I took a great deal of time in searching "Pearls from the Bible" for possibly appropriate verses, keeping only a very few pictures in my mind at a time. This sufficed for most of the pictures, but some of the hardest pictures required hours of study in order to find any verses which seemed to fit. After all possibly appropriate verses were obtained, the elimination process began, and here the keen judgment of my wife was of great value, for she ruled out some of my "pet" verses at a glance and I don't think she ever made a mistake. By selection and elimination I thus secured the verses which I felt could not be disregarded, and the use of two books enabled me to get all of those necessary verses before the judges. In some cases naturally they failed to think as I did, notably in the case of Pic ture No. 4. I wish to thank you most heartily for the check.

Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM N. WYSHAM.

4th PRIZE WINNER Finds the Money a Godsend

YOUR telegram informing me that I had won fourth prize in the Second Bible Picture Study, came as a very welcome surprise I assure you and I wish to thank you for same. I am a letter carrier and have a wife and three small children and with the prices of living necessities going up I could hardly keep clear of debts and this prize money will enable us to get some few things we would otherwise have had to do without. But if I hadn't won a cash award, we feel that we are greatly benefited through the study by the increased knowledge and understanding of the Bible. I found it a real pleasure and would recommend this method of Bible study to any one, as I think it is the very best way possible to get the meaning clearly impressed in one's mind. I would advise any of the readers of The Christian Herald who are not now using this method to send for an outfit and start. I am sure if they are not interested in it now they will be before they have studied this way very long. The harder the pictures seemed to be to solve, the more interested I would get and I have actually sat and studied on one certain picture till late in the night before that pleasing feeling assured me that I had conquered it to my satisfaction.

HERBERT W. LANDIS.

A Week in the World's News

won the respect of his political enemies. He made several visits to America, always in the interest of Irish freedom.

LA FOLLETTE REBUKED. Following the lead of the State Senate, the lower house of the Wisconsin legislature on March 6 by a vote of 53 to 32 adopted a resolution condemning Senator Robert La Follette and all others, "who have failed to see the righteousness of our nation's cause and who have failed to support our government in matters vital to the winning of the war."

OUR ANNUAL BONFIRE. Loss by fire in the United States in 1917 totaled $230,000,000, the greatest in the nation's history except in 1906, in which year the San Francisco conflagration occurred.

BILLY SUNDAY QUILTS THE CAPITAL. The Sunday campaign in Washington made a whirlwind finish on March 3, when 18,000 jammed the tabernacle, while 10,000 more were turned away. In the campaign Mr. Sunday preached to more than a million persons. More than 15,000 converts followed the sawdust trail to the evangelist's warm handclasp, and the free-will offering for Mr. Sunday totaled $16,332.

DRY FORCES UNITE. Meetings in New York City during the latter week of February resulted in the Union of twenty-eight temperance associations into the National Dry Federation, in which they will pool their resources and their energies. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League were neither of them included in the Federation, but the new organization and the two old ones will pull together in the fight for ratification of the prohibition amendment to the national constitution. A hot fight is on for the ratification of the amendment by the Empire State.

AGREEMENT ON RAILROAD BILL. The House and Senate conferees reported the Administration railroad bill back to the respective houses of Congress on March 7. In its final shape the bill provided for government control for twenty-one months following the conclusion of peace. The President's ratemaking power was retained and was made subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

FEWER AUTOS. A meeting of the national Automobile Chamber of Commerce in New York City on March 7 resulted in an agreement between the automobile industry and the War Industries Board by which it was provided that automobile production, for the present year, would be reduced by 30 per cent.

SENATE PASSES WAR FINANCE BILL. The Senate on March 7 by a vote of 74 to 3 passed the Administration's War Finance Corporation Bill.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. If you feel moved, as some already have, to add a "Liberty Gift" to your check for the Income Tax, Uncle Sam will take it as an evidence of patriotic purpose. . . . The suggestion was made in the Senate on March 2 that labor be conscripted for work on the farm if no other scheme should be devised to insure a record crop. The Food Administration is planning the organization of a big army of boys to work on the farms during the summer. . . . The House of Representatives on March 6 passed a bill declaring that all strikes called to obstruct war industry are conspiracies and attaching to the instigation of such strikes a penalty of 30 years' imprisonment and a fine. . . . The Senate Judiciary Committee, on March 6, refused, 9 to 6, to report the Overman Bill, which would authorize the President as a war measure, to coordinate the departments of the government. Senators object to the bill as granting dangerous powers, which they thought should not be granted, even though the President would probably not misuse them. . . . Mark L. Requa said on March 6 that there was no shortage of petroleum for immediate needs, and that the chief problems were increased production and 100 per cent. transportation. He suggested that, while the government would not take over the oil fields, there would be a probable pooling of facilities, including transportation by land and sea. He said also that there was no disposition at this time to shut off supplies of gasoline for pleasure automobiles.

The Progress of the War

THE Russian situation still continues to dominate the war.

A German semi-official agency in Berlin was quoted as saying: "We have acquired a direct free route via Russia to Persia and Afghanistan." Thus it appears that Germany's peace with Russia, the Ukraine and Rumania gives her a new route to India in lieu of the Bagdad route at present blocked by the British forces in Mesopotamia. The Japanese drive through Siberia is, therefore, looked upon by Allied military leaders as the only answer which the Entente can give at the present time to Germany's progress eastward.

As the days pass it becomes more and more evident that the peace which may be ratified by the Russians at Moscow on March 12 will in all probability be a peace of enmity. It will last only so long a time as may be required to constitute from the present disorganized condition an army willing to fight for Russian liberty.

With Russia out of the way Germany is left free if she is permitted to hold the initiative to use her strength and that of her allies against the Entente Allies on any one of five fronts, Mesopotamia, Palestine, the Balkans, Italy, and in the west.

Meantime in Italy and along the western front, in France and Belgium, the artillery exchange increases in intensity, while attacks on a more and more ambitious scale are met and made by both sides.

Premier Clemenceau on March 3 decorated two lieutenants, two sergeants and two privates of the American forces for heroism displayed in repulsing the German raid on March 1st. In this first serious action 20 Americans were killed. On March 8 the Germans opposite the American sector were said to be vigorously preparing for a new attack.

Sir Eric Geddes, First Lord of the British Admiralty, on March 5, declared that submarines were being destroyed in increasing numbers; that they were being destroyed at least as fast as the Germans could build them, and that the chance that a submarine would return from the waters around England was 1 in 4 or 1 in 5. British vessels sunk by submarines during the past week numbered 18, 12 of over 1,600 tons and 6 of less.

American forces on March 6 were reported in the new position in Lorraine, where they assisted in repelling a German raid. This shows American forces as active in four portions of the battle line; in one of which, northwest of Toul, they are holding something over 8 miles of the front. Secretary of War Baker's arrival in France was announced, on March 10.

The British troops reported successful raids during the week east of Arras and in the neighborhood of Lens. In the Ypres sector a German attack over a front about a mile was repulsed by British troops after certain elements of forward positions had been lost and regained. German attacks were also repelled by Belgians. In these actions the Germans took some prisoners and lost some. German air raiders on March 8 again raided London. 11 persons were killed and 46 wounded.

The British are continuing their advances in Palestine, having driven northward to the depth of 3 miles on a frontage of 18 miles along the Jerusalem-Nablus Road. On March 10 the occupation of Hit, west of Bagdad, in Mesopotamia, was announced. Paris suffered an attack on March 8, thirteen persons being killed and fifty injured. One raider was brought down.

How to clean mops and brooms

After mops, brooms and brushes have done their share of the cleaning, they need a bit of cleaning themselves. The grease and oil with which they come in contact lodge in the mop and broom bristles. Try dissolving a heaping tablespoonful of Gold Dust in a pail of hot water. Swish the mops and brushes up and down in this water. They will come out fresh and sterilized because Gold Dust so thoroughly dissolves the grease. (Advertisement.)

WHY MISS THE SUPER PLEASURES OF LIFE?

Why not enjoy yourself as others enjoy themselves who are more highly alive and who have super energy, super health, super vitality and super powers of every character, through conscious evolution?

Why deny yourself the keenest of pleasures? Why miss the extreme joy of life? Why miss the super pleasures?

If you cannot exert your greatest possible brain and body power for long stretches at a time; if you cannot complete big tasks without feeling the need of rest afterwards; if you cannot be just as alert, as quick, as vibrant, as energetic at bed time as you are in your freshest morning hour; if you cannot resist and throw off the fatigue elements so that you are never compelled to rest or even let down in your activities of mind or body—if you cannot do these things you do not know what it is to live! You are sacrificing golden treasures and golden pleasures, you are giving up at least one-half of your rightful proportion of joy, happiness, pleasure, health, energy, vitality, strength and success—you are missing at least fifty per cent. of what you could easily secure out of life simply because you are so easily overpowered by negative elements.

You Are Only One-Fourth to One-Half Alive!

If you are inclined to lean up against something when standing—if you are inclined to let your shoulders droop when sitting—if you want to go to bed early,—if you are tired upon arising—if you feel that you must "be careful" not to do things that you would like to do—afraid to eat what you like, or work late and hard; or if you have a pet list of mental and physical "don'ts"—you are missing at least three-fourths of what life holds for you!

You are only one-fourth to one-half as alive as you think you are! The billions of tiny cells of which your body and brain are composed, are of varying degrees of activity—some are alive, some are weakened, some are practically lifeless and some are totally dead. The activity of your body and brain, their resistant powers against fatigue, their ability to think, create, accomplish, are entirely dependent upon the degree of activity of all the cells. Most people have a predominant quantity of antagonizing, non-alive cells, which master and overpower the live elements, making them easy victims of "averagitis."

Are You Suffering From Averagitis?

Averagitis is the disease of being only an average, or below average person, instead of an exceptional person. Most people are only average in health, average in wealth, average in mental capacity, average in everything instead of being exceptional in health, exceptional in wealth, exceptional in mental capacity, exceptional in everything. Perhaps you think there is no hope for you—that Nature has made you what you are—that it is natural for you to get tired—that Nature governs your destiny—that nothing you can do will change your position or prospects. The truth is that Nature makes us only as great, as mentally alert, as physically powerful as we compel her! We hold in our hands our own fate. One man molds ordinary nothings while the sculptor molds the same clay into magnificent masterpieces. So do some of us mold our own material into ordinary nothings while others make of themselves locomotives of energy, power, activity, and giants in mental equipment.

You are Nature—Nature is You. The material with which you have to work is the billions of cells in your system. By cultivating and developing these cells through CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION you can become as exceptional as you desire in every department of the body, including the brain, mind and personality. Conscious Evolution can so develop the brain and nervous system, the heart, the liver, the kidneys, the muscles, the stomach, in fact every organ and part of the body so that you will not know what it is to feel tired or listless, you will not know what it is to have indigestion or any of the ailments or complaints that sufferers from "averagitis" must have! Conscious Evolution will make you look better to others and to yourself. Conscious Evolution will so supply you with reserve energy that you will not suffer from over-eating or over-exertion,—you will be able to withstand excesses, break Nature's laws,—make your own laws of Nature. And the most remarkable thing about Conscious Evolution is that no drugs, medicine, appliances, apparatus, cold baths, violent exercise, or any other dangerous or disagreeable element is required—there is nothing to give up, nothing to do that you will object to; it requires an average of less than fifteen minutes a day, and the beneficial results are noticeable after the first five minutes!

Don't Labor Under Handicaps

Conscious Evolution can make your brain so quick-acting, so powerful in thought, so fatigue-proof, so eager to grapple with problems that your material success will amaze you! Conscious Evolution will make you so great in health and mind power that it will never be late enough for you to feel sleepy, or early enough for you to want to remain in bed, and no task will ever be dreaded. You will not be handicapped by detracting physical disorders or mental inefficiency because you will have left them behind. You will not know there is such a thing as failure. Without the knowledge of how to Consciously Evolutionize every cell, tissue and organ of the body, you are depriving yourself of pleasures and advantages for which you have been wishing all your life—you are living an inferior life, you are denying yourself the success that can easily be yours. Why deny yourself the super pleasures and super joys, the real and substantial happiness? How long will you let your negative elements rule you?

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE" are the A, B, C of evolution and persistent youth. These books explain Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. They explain the Swoboda theory and the laws of mind and body. They startle, educate and enlighten. They explain as never before the reason for the evolution of the mind and body.

They tell how the cells and their energies build the organs and the body, and how to organize the cells beyond the point where Nature left off for you, and where you, as Nature, may continue your self evolution.

These books will give you a better understanding of yourself than you could obtain through reading all of the books on all of the sciences and philosophies on the subject of mind and body.

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE" will show you how you can increase the pleasures of life to a maximum—how to intensify them and how to make your life more profitable, pleasurable and joyous.

These essays will show you the way to the full life, the superior life, the more satisfactory life, the lively life. They will show you how to overcome the inferior life, the feeble life, the negative life, the unsatisfactory life.

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE" will show you how to increase your pleasures and happiness to a maximum, and how to reduce your troubles of every character, mental, physical, physiological and conceptual, to a minimum.

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" will show you how to intensify, prolong, increase and magnify your pleasures.

"CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION" and "THE SCIENCE OF LIFE" will show you that you have not as yet experienced the real and highest pleasures of life, and will show you how to attain the super pleasures of life.

Life will mean much more to you when you intensify your pleasures through Conscious Evolution.

Why Deny Yourself Super Pleasures, Super Joys and Real Happiness?

President Wilson Calls for a "Home Garden Army"

Every Yard to Be a Garden Plot With 5,000,000 Boy and Girl Workers

By ROBERT H. MOULTON

PRESIDENT WILSON has written Secretary Lane of the Interior Department, expressing the hope that "every school will have a regiment in the Volunteer War Garden Army." The army of school children, it is hoped, may raise this year produce amounting to $500,000,000. This is what the President has written:

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I sincerely hope that you may be successful through the Bureau of Education in arousing the interest of teachers and children in the schools of the United States in the cultivation of home gardens. Every boy and girl who really sees what the home garden may mean will, I am sure, enter into the purpose with high spirits, because I am sure they would all like to feel that they are in fact fighting in France by joining the home garden army. They know that America has undertaken to send meat and flour and wheat and other foods for the support of the soldiers who are doing the fighting, for the men and women who are making the munitions, and for the boys and girls of Western Europe, and that we must also feed ourselves while we are carrying on this war.

The movement to establish gardens, therefore, and to have the children work in them is just as real and patriotic an effort as the building of ships or the firing of cannon. I hope that this spring every school will have a regiment in the Volunteer War Garden Army.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior.

IT is Secretary Lane's idea that is being worked out through Commissioner Claxton of the Bureau of Education, to have five million boys and girls of the schools in every city, town and village in the country, captained by forty thousand teachers, produce as nearly as possible all of the vegetables, small fruits and eggs for their home consumption. To the extent that each district is able to supply itself with these food products, the railways will be relieved of the burden of transporting them, and the Allies in Europe and our own soldiers on the battle front will get that much more of the food of which they are in need.

It should not be imagined, because hundreds of thousands of food gardens were planted throughout the United States last spring, that the work of adding to our food supplies is to stop there. It is equally important that city dwellers should continue this year and next year, and perhaps the year after that, the work of utilizing our back yards and vacant lots.

It is perfectly possible for those who are thrifty and patient enough to look after their own gardens to provide food for themselves, their families, and perhaps some of their neighbors.

Unfortunately, a good many have been deterred from attempting a back yard garden because they believed the soil was unfitted to grow crops of any sort. But now a new method of cultivation has been introduced, by which it is possible to raise excellent crops on a bed prepared on most any kind of soil; even on a brick or cement pavement, or the tarred or tiled surfaces of the roofs of buildings, if need be.

This new system of gardening is called the "sandwich bed" method, and has been tried out with really marvelous results by its inventor, Benjamin F. Albaugh, known nationally as an enthusiast in the subject of city lot gardening. Mr. Albaugh is authority for the statement that three square rods can be made to produce a large part of all the vegetables needed to supply the table of a family of five or six persons throughout the season. He himself has repeatedly produced on such a plot various kinds of vegetables which at a low estimate would have cost $75.

IN making a sandwich bed, the first thing to do is to place a layer of straw or stable litter or leaves, about five inches thick, upon the surface selected, and then tramp or pack it rather firm and smooth. Over this spread a layer about one inch deep of rich, fine stable manure. Another layer of stable manure about two inches thick goes over this, after which a hose should be turned on and the mass given a thorough soaking, care being exercised to stop before leaching begins.

The next step is to spread evenly over the bed at least four inches of street scrapings, avoiding, however, streets that have oil or asphalt in their construction. If street scrapings cannot readily be obtained, a composition of equal parts of fine river sand, rich garden soil and old, fine stable manure may be used instead. This should be thoroughly mixed by shoveling over in a heap, and then, after it is in place, tramped until it is firm. The bed is then ready to plant, and if properly tended will yield wonderful results.

In some instances the real sandwich bed is not possible or practicable. If this be the case, and the soil is yet reasonably fertile and in good condition, excellent results may be obtained by the following method:

Procure one load of rich stable manure for each square rod of ground and dump it near where the beds are to be made. Then with a spading fork, beginning at one end of the bed, spade a furrow across the bed, fill the furrow nearly full of manure, and tramp it down firm. Now spade another furrow, throwing the dirt from this over the tramped down manure in the first furrow. Fill the second furrow with manure and tramp it down as before, and then throw over this the dirt from the third line of spading, continuing this process until the entire bed is spaded.

FINEST vegetables can be grown on hard, stony or alkaline soils, where ordinary cultivation would be utterly fruitless. For best results plants need aeration at the roots. If air cannot penetrate to the roots, the plant languishes and dies from suffocation. When the surface of the ground is covered with water, the plant suffers in the same way and for the same reason. The "sandwich beds" can neither be drowned nor smothered. The air circulates through the several layers of materials, and if too much water is applied, it readily passes through the fibrous beds and does no harm. Other advantages of these beds are that the fertility is placed just where it can be easily absorbed and assimilated by the plants, the fibrous nature of the bed causes it to warm up earlier than does the natural soil, and the decaying mass of fibrous material retains moisture to such an extent that only a nominal quantity of hydrant water is required.

A steel garden rake, a spading fork, a small garden trowel, a long handled shovel, a manure fork, and a small hand sprayer are about all the tools that need be purchased. A hand sprayer with a quart Mason glass jar for a reservoir has the advantage of blowing the spray at right angles from the barrel of the machine. With it the under side of the leaves can be effectually reached, and this is often essential to success. The barrel should be of brass, as many spraying compounds are corrosive on iron. With this little machine, and a supply of Bordeaux mixture, hellebore, tobacco extract, or tea, Paris green, aphine, etc., the careful gardener is well fortified against attacks of insects and fungi.

THE provisioning of the country will be much aided by the educational work among boys and girls of the United States which has been carried on through the cooperation of the Department of Agriculture and the rural school garden clubs of the various states. The younger generation has been stimulated in the raising of vegetables and fruits on waste land and in the back yards in the cities and towns.

An example of what can be accomplished by the pupils of rural schools was strikingly demonstrated last year by the Cook County, Illinois, Garden Club, which had a membership of 2,387. The club cultivated over 260 acres of land, upon which grew nearly $48,000 worth of vegetables. After deducting expenses the club members had a net profit of $41,629.28. If these 2,387 boys and girls had not grown these gardens, probably 75 per cent. of them would have been idle—doing nothing—throwing away time and energy. The gardens gave helpful exercise, stimulated interest and encouraged thrift and ownership.

The economic side of the problem is astonishing, but greater still, and of far more importance, is the wholesome moral influence brought to bear upon the lives of these young people, who are receiving most excellent training in doing worth-while things.

FORTUNATELY it isn't necessary for many boys and girls to resort to the sandwich bed for a garden. Thousands live in the small towns and open country where rich soil or soil that can be readily enriched is plentiful and ready for action. Manure may be scarce, but leaves, so often raked up and wasted in bonfires, are good substitutes for manure and are as easy to spade under. A sandy soil enriched with last year's leaves will make a good return to the one who cultivates it. The leaves help to hold the moisture and their rotting tissues feed the growing plants.

The boy or girl who rises with the sun, who puts in the before-breakfast time cultivating a patch of garden, is a soldier of Liberty just as truly as the man in khaki who tumbles out of his tent at the call of reveille. The boy or girl who tends a crop to maturity, who gathers in beans and peas and beets and potatoes, is defending America and her cause as surely as the soldier in the listening-post who detects and foils an enemy raid.

The children abroad are doing more than would ordinarily be considered their fair share. On their small shoulders has fallen much of the load their fathers carried in times of peace. But with sturdy will and manly and womanly resolution, they have performed the heavy tasks.

The Need for the Easter Message

IT was Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, that dear mother-hearted, consecrated poet of a generation ago, who sang:

"Wherever the soul of a people, arising in courage and might,
Bursts forth from the wrongs which have shrouded its hope in the gloom of the night,
Wherever, in sight of God's legions, the armies of evil recede,
The truth wins a soul or a kingdom, the Master is risen indeed!"

Such lines as these come like a tonic to the grieved spirit at Easter in war time. They bring refreshment and cheer. For never in our history was the message of Easter more needed than now.

The recurrence of Easter calls to mind the world's greatest tragedy, the crucifixion of Christ. How awful it must have seemed to the followers of Jesus over nineteen hundred years ago, when he was so cruelly slain and buried in a sealed sepulcher!

How terrible it seems to us today that barbarities are practiced upon innocent peoples; that men fall upon and rend each other till there are mountains of dead and rivers of blood; that the highest inventive skill and philosophical minds have been diverted to the uses of destruction and revenge!

Easter comes to remind us that just as Christ was not annihilated by cruel oppressors and unbelievers, so the ideals of Christian faith and practice have not been destroyed. They live because they are divine; and when "the stone has been rolled away," the dense massed clouds of carnage and bloodshed will vanish and the Christ shall come into his own again!

Only the coming of Easter could bring this note of hope. Only the great tragedy which it commemorates could visualize the future for us. Easter crowns majestically the unfolding promise of undying faith, and even if the world sends up echoes of discordant conflict, Eastertime's message gains in impressiveness of meaning on that account.

Is there any who can doubt in the face of the facts the Scriptural declarations that Christ shall "reign until he has put all enemies under his feet; and the last enemy that shall be destroyed is Death"? "Death is swallowed up in victory."

So, in the words of Mary Lowe Dickinson:

"Fling out your banners, brave toilers; bring lifelines to altar and shrine;
Ring out, Easter bells, he is risen; for you is the token and sign;
There's a world moving sunward and Godward; ye are called to the front, ye must lead!

Behind are the grave and the darkness; the Master is risen indeed!"

GRAYSON M. P. MURPHY, of the American Red Cross, has seen children in France, too small to see over the backs of the sheep, acting as shepherds. "This war is not a war of armies, but of peoples," he has said. "The life of every man, woman, and child in Europe is affected by it to an extent that is inconceivable here in America. In France alone 3,000,000 men have been put out of commission by the war—killed, disabled, or taken prisoners. Try to realize what it would mean to America to lose 10,000,000 men, and you will see why every one left in France must do his utmost to keep the country going. I have seen children six and seven years old working in the fields, carrying their little fagots through the village streets and driving the flocks home at night—little tots who couldn't see over the backs of the sheep.

"They are the children of the men who are fighting for us on the battle fronts of France, of Italy, and of Belgium. Soon your own fathers and brothers will be fighting beside them in the trenches, shoulder to shoulder. We must stand solidly behind them with help and encouragement, all of us down to the last man, woman, and child. You, the boys and girls of America, must find a way to let them know that you are backing them to win the war with every means at your command, that America is a real friend."

Chicago Welcomes Billy Sunday

By RALPH M. MORPHETT

"I AM looking forward to having the time of my life in our meetings in the dear old city."

Such was the way in which Evangelist Sunday referred to his Chicago campaign, when he talked matters over on the occasion of his flying visit, just prior to the start of the meetings in Washington.

"It was in Chicago," he added, "that I found my life and my wife—two of the very best things that ever came my way. Dear old Pacific Garden Mission! Colonel George Clarke and Mother Clarke and friend Harry Monroe are precious memories to me. I never think of Chicago without recalling that eventful night when I decided to quit sin and yield my life to God; and so, for the blessing that came to me and for which I owe a great debt, I am going to try and get even by giving Chicago ten weeks."

It is an open secret that the workers who accompany Mr. Sunday to the city—and their number is being augmented for this campaign—are each anxious to be at their very best, so that everything shall combine in making the Chicago mission, in every sense of the word, a record one.

In the spring of 1917 a Chicago committee of one hundred was formed, and from that period to the present moment all have been busily engaged making plans and enlisting the cooperation of pastors and churches. In September last Dr. Howard Agnew Johnson delivered a series of addresses on "Aspects of Personal Work" in churches in different parts of the city. During January of this year a systematic effort was made to cover the city with neighborhood prayer meetings, and these were started early in February. Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, met at these home gatherings for prayer. Many pastors state that the meetings have resulted in a deepening interest in the regular services of the church. At one large Chicago church the attendance at the week-night service doubled.

THE enrolment of 40,000 in the Men's Adult Bible Classes, even before the start of the campaign, was another movement that quickly gained impetus, and the latest reports indicate a sure "going over the top." Three choirs, two mixed and one of men, have been organized, and together they total close upon 6,000 voices.

From the plans already made it is predicted that the noonday meetings for women and girls in the business section will be one of the most successful features of the campaign. It is proposed to open several lunch rooms in the "Loop District," and in these a meal consisting of three sandwiches, cake, milk or coffee and pickles will be provided for a dime, and while it is being served, short addresses are to be given. Many women prominent in the religious and social life of the city are deeply interested in the promotion of this effort. The Sunday-school teachers are cooperating in a plan to reach the high school pupils and the grade schools also.

There are many who, during the preliminary work, have rendered valuable help. A convert, Al Saunders, has told in over a hundred churches the story of his conversion during Mr. Sunday's visit to Scranton, Pa.

IT WAS the wish of the committee and also of the evangelist that a site for the Tabernacle should be secured in Grant Park on the East Side of Michigan Avenue, but this was not practicable. A suitable site was secured on the north side of the city, near Chicago Avenue and the Lake. The location is about fifteen minutes ride from the center of the city, and accessible from all parts. The tabernacle is the largest ever built for "Billy Sunday," being 348 feet long by 247 feet wide. It will seat 12,000, or 800 more than any previous Sunday building, and when vestibule partitions are lowered, 4,000 additional can stand within hearing. There are 2,500 seats on the platform; 2,000 of these will be occupied by the choir. Five hundred thousand feet of lumber were used in the erection of the Tabernacle, and the cost totaled $67,000. One hundred tons of sawdust has been already used to cover the "trails." It is planned to have 500 ushers and doorkeepers on duty at each service. Two hundred secretaries and a like number of personal workers will also be in attendance. As no babies are allowed at the services, a check-room has been provided for the little ones, and nurses will be on hand to care for them while the parents and friends are in the meeting. A restaurant with accommodations for 1,000 persons is a feature of the building. THE meetings extend from March 10 to May 19. On Sunday, three services; on week days—Tuesday to Saturday—two services. Considerably over 300 churches are cooperating in the campaign. The tabernacle was dedicated Sunday afternoon, March 3, an audience of about 10,000 being present.

Bishop Thomas Nicholson of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the course of his address, referring to Mr. Sunday, said: "If Chicago will give Billy Sunday half a chance, I believe he will lead a movement as significant to Chicago as the revivals of '57 were to this nation, or as the Wesley revivals were to England." Dr. Frank Gunsaulus, in speaking of the evangelist and the campaign, said: "There is coming to Chicago the greatest voice of modern times to speak in favor of right and of truth. When our boys return from Europe, they will find this a better United States because of the patriotism of Billy Sunday. They will also find Chicago a cleaner and better city, because of his visit here."

The specially prepared responsive service at the opening was indicative of the hopes entertained by the committee as to the outcome of the campaign. It read thus:

"We dedicate this Tabernacle for the rebuilding of broken homes and neglected family altars; for the establishment of broken faiths and the payment of forgotten vows; for the mending of broken hearts and the healing of shattered lives; for the encouragement of everything wholesome, uplifting and righteous; for the destruction of evil in places high and low; for the winning of the lost through the power of a crucified and risen Redeemer."

I AM authorized by Evangelist Sunday to send you this message:

"My Christian love to the editor and staff of the Christian Herald. Chicago tendered me the greatest ovation I have ever received during the twenty years of my work as an evangelist. I preached to more than 50,000 persons last Sunday. The Chicago papers are reporting the meetings magnificently. The organization of our campaign is practically perfect. I am planning to go to France in July."

What Our Government Is Doing to Make Its Maimed Heroes Self-Supporting—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE spent this morning with the Federal Board for Vocational Education. This is one of Uncle Sam's new organizations which will bulk large in winning the war, and in enabling our industries to compete with those of other nations after the war is over. It has also to do with the training of the wounded when they come back from France. The board was arranged for on a peace basis by an act of Congress last spring, with the idea of giving mechanical and technical training to the millions of our boys and girls who are going into agriculture, industry and commerce. It was to be paid for by the national government and the governments of the states, and was to include all sorts of occupations of an industrial nature.

THE work had hardly been started when the war began, and the machine was taken over to be used for the training of certain mechanics, machinists, special laborers and technicians for the United States Army. It is now establishing schools for this purpose all over the country, and it is sending out directions for the information of the training centers for military purposes in every locality. There will be evening classes and Sunday classes, where the drafted men can attend between the time when they are selected and their departure for the cantonments, and before many months it is expected that all the technical and trade schools of the country will be drafted into the service, the work to go on during the next summer vacation. There are altogether about 122 technical and engineering schools in the United States, and these include such colleges as the Boston Tech., the Yale Scientific School, the Armour Institute of Chicago and the Carnegie School in Pittsburg. All will probably be used for the training of soldiers next summer. It is also planned to use such public schools as have machine shops and manual training equipment, and if these are not enough to supply the demand the government will employ certain of the industrial plants for night schools.

THIS war is not like any other in history. It is a war of efficiency of machines and machinists. If the United States is to win it must have machines equal to or better than those of the enemy, and it must have machinists and technicians able to use them and keep them in repair. For every man who fights there must be at least one skilled man behind the lines. Much of the work involved is that of the foundry or factory rather than that of the old-time battle-field.

The Germans have understood this and prepared for it. The scheme was planned out by Prince Bismarck forty or fifty years ago, and schools were organized to teach the people all sorts of trades and occupations, and especially those that might be of value in war. The employers of all workmen under eighteen years of age had to give them time to attend these schools, and the government watched over the training. As a result, the German army is made up largely of experts. For instance, the Germans had, when they marched into Belgium, according to the secretary of the International Acetylene Gas Company, 20,000 machinists who had been trained in the use of oxy-acetylene gas for the welding and cutting of steel in the destruction and repair of guns and machinery. This gas makes a flame that will cut through twelve inches of steel as though it were cheese. It will cut a big gun in two within a few minutes, and applied to the bore of the gun, will destroy it within a few seconds. By it, all kinds of steel may be welded and all weapons of war repaired. We have only a few mechanics who can do this class of work, and some man has given a quarter of a million dollars to start schools to teach such experts for the auto and gas-engine men. Expert automobile machinists are wanted for the repair factories and in the garages and in the field. Motor truck drivers are needed and also foundrymen and those who can do all kinds of masonry and carpenter work. The army calls for different classes of miners and railroad mechanics. It needs bridge-builders and steel-metal workers as well as wireless operators, telephone and telegraph repairmen and mechanical experts as to all things connected with structural steel.

THE chief of the Signal Corps estimates that they will need 79,000 such men for the aviation branch by the 1st of next June. These men will include more than 14,000 cabinetmakers, 14,000 chauffeurs and 14,000 coppersmiths and metal workers. The service needs 2,600 welders and an equal number of men who can repair ignito and magneto machinery. It needs 7,200 to repair instruments of various kinds, and 21,600 men skilled in working on motors. The board has outlined courses and directions for students who wish to become a part of that service.

The United States Signal Corps needs also 15,000 radio and buzzer operators, and the training of these has already been inaugurated in many parts of the country. Many of the drafted men are taking up the study. Upon first assignment to radio or buzzer work, the soldiers' wages rise to $36 per month, and as he grows more expert they become $51 per month, and if he gets to be a master signal electrician he receives $81 a month. The preliminary training necessary to fit the drafted men for this service requires about 200 hours, and enables a man to send and receive a minimum message of twenty words of five letters. The instruction is given free and the Federal Board would like to have teaching classes established over the United States.

THE Federal Board for Vocational Education has prepared courses of instruction and questions for the examinations of applicants who want places in the Signal Corps, and also for some of the other branches of the army. The requirements are not easy and the work demands experts. Take, for instance, the soldier who wishes to enlist in the Quartermaster's Reserve Corps as a motor truckman. He has first to pass the physical tests, and then to answer twenty-five questions as to the operation and care of motor trucks. If he does this successfully he is given shop work, which includes the adjusting, repairing and lubricating of the parts of the truck. He is next taught to drive, not in the ordinary way, but in that which will enable him to do his work in war time. A part of the driving is straightaway and a large part of it is zigzag, including the swift turning of corners. The zigzag driving is in and out of stakes which have been driven down into the ground to represent a curved course, and the student must wind the truck about through them without knocking them over. Later the stakes are brought closer and closer together and the man winds about between them at various rates of speed. Later he has to learn to back through the zigzag lines, and then go backward and forward without touching the stakes.

Another important work of this war training board will be in connection with the rehabilitation of our disabled soldiers and sailors. It will take war. I understand that that work is now going on, and that the experts will be sent to France at the earliest possible moment.

THESE welders are only one class of the new mechanics needed by the army. The government is sending out questionnaires to all the men on the conscripted lists. It asks them to give their trades and professions and the work of various kinds in which they have been engaged, and from these

From the trenches to toy-making and a livelihood papers it is trying to build up a corps of machinists to be sent with the soldiers to France. It has found a great lack in every branch of expert men needed, and this includes all kinds of mechanical work. The need is so great that the adjutant general of the army has recently sent out a letter to the commanding generals of the departments, and the chiefs of bureaus of the United States, instructing that men be trained for the army under the advice of this board. The letter cites eighty-seven different occupations in which especially trained men are needed. Among the most important are electricians, blacksmiths, engineers and

Russia's Soviets Yield to Germany

PRESIDENT WILSON on March 11 sent to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, scheduled to meet at Moscow on the following day, a message of sympathy which was calculated both to assure these representatives of the Russian people that they were not deserted by their former Allies, and to strengthen them for the difficult deliberations before them. In some quarters it was felt that the message might result in the rejection of the so-called peace terms imposed upon Russia by the Teutonic Powers, but few expected anything under the existing circumstances but ratification. At their first session, on March 14, the delegates voted, 453 to 30, to accept the German terms. The message of the President is printed elsewhere on this page. Thus the President expressed his confidence in the Russia that is to be, and held out to the sorely pressed leaders of this revolution within a revolution the assurance that America's strong arm would at the proper time strike from them the shackles of autocracy now closing about the body of their liberties. The President was not alone in his confidence in Russia. John R. Mott, a member of the Root Commission, was quoted as declaring his belief that Russia was sound at heart, and that out from the inner turmoil of the present would come a stabilized, free and independent nation, which might again be an acceptable ally in the fight for world freedom. Meanwhile plans were still making for the intervention of Japan in Siberia.

Tokyo dispatches of March 12 reported negotiations between the Japanese and the Siberian government; the Siberian government being a Socialist republic, which has not recognized the authority of the Bolsheviks, and whose armies were actively resisting the advance of a Bolshevik force eastward along the line of the Manchuria railway. This army, under the leadership of Gen. Semenov, was on March 12 said to have retreated into Manchuria after being defeated by a superior force of Bolsheviks, the accuracy of whose fire indicated that former German prisoners might be participating in the action. Relief trains were sent forward from Harbin. Chinese troops prepared to resist any advance of the Bolsheviks into Manchuria. Prince Lvoff, who was last week reported as in Peking organizing an expedition against the Bolsheviks, was reported from Petrograd under arrest.

Bolshevik propaganda was said to be gaining in eastern Siberia, especially permeating the ranks of the railway men, and there were various uncertain rumors of expeditions under German auspices being formed to seize Vladivostok before Japan could act. Meantime Japan was moving carefully, there being no inclination to take any action which might drive Russia toward Germany. Dispatches of March 14 indicated that Japan was watching the council of Soviets and would take no action pending the decision of the council. Foreign Minister Motono stated in the Japanese Diet that Japan had received no request from her Allies to send troops, but that an exchange of views was proceeding.

March 12, the first anniversary of the revolution which deposed the Czar, was celebrated quietly in Petrograd. Work was suspended, but there were no demonstrations in this once imperial city, now being slowly deserted by its Rumania's agreement to facilitate the passage of troops to Odessa, this great southern port of Russia having been occupied by German and Austrian troops on March 13. A careful study of the peace treaty with the Ukrainians developed the interesting fact that Odessa was not definitely included in known whether the party left Odessa before its capture by the Germans. The Germans entered the naval port of Nikolayev, 70 miles northeast of Odessa, on March 17.

The complete domination of Finland by Germany was evidenced by difficulties placed in the way of Allied diplomatic staffs seeking to reach Sweden through Finland, some Americans being detained, by the "escape" of the Finnish Premier from Helsingfors to Germany, and by the landing of German troops at strategic points and their movement inland.

The Congress of Soviets received President Wilson's message and replied expressing its appreciation to the laboring and exploited classes in the United States. The Soviets also, in the name of the Russian Republic, expressed "to all peoples who are dying and suffering from the horrors of this imperialistic war, its warm sympathy and firm conviction that the happy time is near when the laboring masses in all bourgeois countries will throw off the capitalist yoke and establish a socialist state of society." The congress also received with some enthusiasm the message sent by Samuel Gompers.

Wheat ready for export at Odessa, Russia's Black Sea Gateway, entered March 13, by German troops population, who for weeks had been steadily moving eastward on trains, on sledges and on foot.

President Wilson's message met with the fullest approval of the British Liberals, being regarded in London as the territory of the Ukrainian republic. This, coupled with the facts that Trebizond in Turkish Armenia, on the opposite shore of the Black Sea, had been retaken by the Turks, and that from Trebizond through Persia there is a

President Wilson's Message to Russia

May I not take advantage of the meeting of the Congress of the Soviets to express the sincere sympathy which the people of the United States feel for the Russian people at this moment when the German power has been thrust in to interrupt and turn back the whole struggle for freedom and substitute the wishes of Germany for the purpose of the people of Russia?

Although the government of the United States is, unhappily, not now in a position to render the direct and effective aid it would wish to render, I beg to assure the people of Russia through the congress that it will avail itself of every opportunity to secure for Russia once more complete sovereignty and independence in her own affairs and full restoration to her great role in the life of Europe and the modern world.

The whole heart of the people of the United States is with the people of Russia in the attempt to free themselves forever from autocratic government and become the masters of their own life.

WOODROW WILSON.

a move of high statesmanship. President Samuel Gompers of the American Alliance of Labor and Democracy also sent a message to Russia on March 13, assuring the people of Russia that the organized workmen of America awaited eagerly for some indication as to how they might help Russia.

Rumania, on March 13, seemed to have discovered that the peace treaty which she signed, hard at best, might possibly mask even further hardships, when new demands were presented calling for further "rectification" of the boundary, which rectification left additional sections of former Rumanian territory in Austrian hands. The Teutonic Powers also made prompt use of direct route to India, made some correspondents wonder what the German high command might propose to make permanent in this quarter of the territory of her former enemy. There was fierce fighting in the Ukraine on March 14 between German troops and Bolsheviks reinforced by German and Austrian deserters.

The Allied military commissions to Rumania, the American Red Cross representative and the American military attaché left Jassy for Odessa on March 9. Austria and Germany had agreed to the repatriation of these representatives of the Allies but attempted to hold them in quarantine for 30 days. At this writing it was not LOYALTY THE ISSUE. On March 11, former Governor Francis E. McGovern withdrew his candidacy for the Wisconsin Republican nomination for United States Senator, placing himself in the service of Congressman Irvine L. Lenroot. The special primary election was scheduled for March 19. Representative Lenroot based his candidacy squarely on the complete support of the nation in the world war, on absolute and unequivocal loyalty. He was opposed for the Republican nomination by James Thompson, candidate of the La Follette following. Victor L. Berger was running for the Socialist nomination. He remained in the race in spite of the fact that he was indicted in Chicago under the Espionage Act. It was generally expected that a large part of the Berger following would vote for Thompson, the Wisconsin law making it possible for any person voting in the primaries to vote for nominees of any party he chooses. The whole country watched this campaign to see how Wisconsin should declare herself.

NEUTRALS UNDER DURESS. The situation of Holland and the Scandinavian countries grows daily more difficult. After months of negotiation agreements were finally concluded between these neutral states and Britain and America by which necessary foodstuffs would be supplied to them. In return for food the neutrals accepted rigid restrictions on their own exports to Germany. These agreements were fiercely assailed in the German press, were declared unneutral and violative of Germany's understandings with the same nations. On March 12 it was announced that the German Central Purchasing Co. had canceled all contracts

The Glorious Easter Hope

A SERMON BY PASTOR JUNIUS B. REMENSNYDER*

TEXT—Mat. 28:8. "And Mary Magdalene and the other Mary departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy."

THE revulsion of joy thrilling these holy women on the first Easter Morn is like to our experience today. They had been passing through a dark and gloomy week of black calamity, when suddenly gladness and joy unutterable broke upon them. So Holy Week has led us through the deep shades of penitence and sorrow to Gethsemane, the Last Supper, Good Friday and the Cross, leaving us in silence and darkness at the sepulchre. But now, lo, as at Christmas, an angel brings joyful tidings to them. Here again an angel voices the greatest, gladdest, most blessed truth that ever thrilled the ears and elated the souls of men: "Christ Is Risen."

Thus our week of sorrows and our way by the Cross, lead us to this brightest morn of time, to the shining morn of immortality, to the glorious vision of eternal life. What a gift is life! What a joy it is to live! The joys of sight and the visions of the eye; the joy of activity and work; the joy of high and noble aims; the joys of the heart, of friendship, and love; the joy of elevated thoughts; the manly joy of overcoming difficulties; the high transports of doing good and sacrifice for truth's sake; the joy in the sense of the beautiful and sublime in nature; the ecstasies in the rapt harmonies of music; the joy in religious worship and prayer—what tongue of archangel can tell the joy, the bliss, the rapture, embraced in this all in all—life!

But sweet, varied and glorious as is this gift of life, we see confronting it the black, spectral, inevitable figure of death. Who, then, but must study this question which concerns his happiness more deeply than all else? This death, which steadily creeps toward me, will it really wrest from me this priceless possession of life? This is the supreme thought for every living soul to reflect upon on Easter Day. To study in the light of the Gospel of the Resurrection.

NATURE here is our first teacher. She is full of emblems of the Resurrection. Could you forecast the golden fruit from the withered blossom, or the bird from the broken shell, or the brilliant-plumaged insects' wings from the chrysalis coffin from which it emerges? So Spring is full of signs. Every Spring, in forest, garden, and field, death is swallowed up of life. All winter the trees stand stripped and bare; the shrubs, the grasses, the flowers sleep in a cold white sepulchre of snow. But in the Spring comes the dawn of a new life. The drifts melt, the fountains flow, the rivers burst their ice bonds, the trees put forth buds and leaves, the grasses awake from their chill slumbers, and the crocus and myrtle peep from the ground—the advance-guard of that lovely army of flowers which will decorate the whole summer with their plumage.

It is the Resurrection time of the visible creation. It is the Easter of the world. It is nature's prophetic answer to the inquiring soul of man, and it is full of hope. It is the grand Epic of Immortality, written by the finger of God upon the strata of the earth.

We find ground again for a hope of future life in ourselves, in our reasonings, in the human mind as it seeks to look into the future. And here we must take the greatest minds, those gifted intellects, the geniuses, who have flashes of perception into the eternities and infinities that are not given to ordinary minds.

SOCRATES, as he drank the cup of fatal hemlock, said to his friend Crito, "Remember that you will not bury me. But my spirit will have flown to a better world." Kant, king of modern philosophers, postulated the soul's immortality on the ground of our need and yearning, of the passionate call for it of the heart, which sees farther than the head. Victor Hugo, representing the great masters of literature, writes: "I see future and eternal life before me as a certainty. It is like a light, so brilliant that other things cannot be seen. But the light shines in that future, and that is all I need." And Tennyson, speaking for the poets, who live on the transfigured altitudes of vision, says: "I can hardly understand how any great imaginative man, who has deeply lived, suffered, thought and wrought, can doubt the soul's continuous progress in after life." Nature and the human soul are instinct with prophecies of immortality.

Still, giving these testimonies all due weight, they but amount to what Addison calls "this pleasing hope, this fond desire, this longing after immortality." And when we turn from the perusal of these naturalistic arguments to the Easter Gospel, see the grave robbed of its prisoner, hear the trumpet-tongued angel sitting on the stone rolled from the mouth of the sepulchre, and behold the crucified and buried Christ in risen, glorified form, proclaiming to the ends of the earth: "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive forevermore," then do we feel as though we had passed from the mists and shadows of opinion and hope, into the clear, open sunlight of fact and certainty.

Only one life has ever fully solved this darkest of all mysteries. Only one life has ever won the victory over death. Only one truth gives us positive assurance that we are to live forever. And no wonder, then that as today men read everywhere in their churches the blessed Easter Gospel, there should ascend from all lands and races and homes and hearts such an outburst of rapture as only was heard when the Almighty One laid the corner-stone of the creation, whereat "the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy!"

AND Mary Magdalene and the other Mary departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy." A mighty truth at once thrills us with two emotions, joy at its glory and fear at the mighty power of God. It was almost too great and glad to be true. From the Cross of defeat and agony to the glory and triumph of Easter. From death and the sepulchre, to Resurrection and life. O what an infinite leap! Their bounding emotions could not be kept within their bosoms. "And they did run to bring the disciples word." So is this the Church's great festival of gladness. She has followed her Lord to the Cross, where he suffers such pains and woe as God alone can bear, that Divine love may offer an infinite sacrifice for the sins of men. Now she acclaims him in his risen glory, victor over death, and Lord and King forevermore.

And in our gladness, let us think what is involved in this great Easter fact? First, if we are to live hereafter, our plans should take in eternity. Here is the vital difference between the worldly and the religious. The worldly person lives and plans and labors only for time, and so he must die "as the fool dieth." To him death is the end of all, so he tries to get what good he can out of the present life and dies without hope. This short-sighted folly our Lord reproved in the words: "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" But the Christian feels that this life is but a seed sown for eternity. Hence he lays his plans for the larger life eternal. He disciplines his soul: he seeks to do good, he serves God; so that he may so enter that future world that he can meet his Judge and enter upon a state of happiness. Easter teaches that our brief life here is but to plan, to build, to prepare in every thought, word, and deed for the larger and more wonderful life eternal.

THE Easter Gospel again teaches that we should not be depressed by present hardships and trials. The primitive disciples had to endure many sacrifices to be faithful to Christ, but how they all faded into nothing when he stood before them in risen splendor, saying: "All power is given to me in heaven and on earth." This explains the differences in human conditions. How trivial, whether one be rich or poor, at ease or in suffering, when life is but a step in our endless career! End life with death, and then what advantage is there in humble service, self-sacrificing heroism and patient martyrdom for the common good? It all comes to one ignoble end. But break a doorway through the farther side of the grave, and make it a thoroughfare to immortal life, and we have a compensation for the hard and bitter experiences that may be our lot.

We need the Easter light to behold a God of Love, to throw a rainbow in our tears, to weave sighs into songs, to bring joy out of suffering, and to show us that earth hath no sorrow that heaven cannot heal. This feature is strikingly illustrated by the diverse inscriptions of the primitive Christians in the catacombs, and those of the pagan sepulchres. The pagan epitaphs were such as "Eternal Sleep;" "Eternal night;" "Eternal House;" expressing tragic melancholy and despair. But the Christian inscriptions were "dormitory"—a temporary resting-place; "Here sleeps our Beloved;" "Sleep in Peace;" "Here rests in Hope;"—grief of separation assuaged by the blessed Easter faith, the certainty of reunion in a happier world.

What wonderful glimpses the Easter Gospel gives of the nature of that life in the hereafter! It is a Resurrection. Not alone the soul is to continue its existence, but our bodies are to rise again. Said the risen Lord to the disciples, "Behold my hands and my feet that it is I myself." That is, his body was identical with his earthly one, even to bearing the marks of the nails on the Cross; yet it was a glorified body, vanishing, and appearing, rising in the air at will, pure and holy, so that he would not suffer even the saintly Magdalene to touch it. Says Luther: "Men and women, boys and girls, just as here, will be in that world. And like the risen Saviour, we shall be as the angels, traveling in the body like a flash, so that at will we can in a moment be on the earth beneath, or in heaven above." And the Christian naturalist Alivart, argues that while eternal youth will crown all, still the characteristics of each in this life will be retained. The mother will clasp her fond little child as she lost it; the husband the wife, recognizing the familiar features that endeared them on earth. Wonderful and glorious as will be the changes, still there will be an identity so that we shall know the dear face, thrill at the fond voice. So also, shall the faculties of the soul—the personality—be wonderfully quickened and brightened. Our mental powers will have new force, strength and range. These are but glimpses indeed. Yet they have a sure foundation in the facts attending the Resurrection of Christ, who is the "First-fruits" of our own. And they show that our future eternal existence, body and spirit, will be such as we now live, only with every blemish removed, and every faculty heightened—a life immeasurably larger, happier, grander.

The book of Revelation gives us a sublime picture of that life, saying: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth. And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it. And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there."

THE infidel Renan truly says that Christianity is built upon the belief in the Resurrection. Bishop Wescott writes: "The ground on which the Apostles rested their appeal was the Resurrection, the duty they felt was to bear witness to it." Christ's triumph over the grave vindicated this divine claim and guaranteed all his promises. Hence, from a weak and downcast band, they went forth with an all-conquering faith and assurance to preach the Gospel. Because of the Resurrection they knew that the new faith and new hopes would transform the world. Their passion for spreading the glad tidings became contagious. Every new disciple saw in the future the universal triumph of the Church.

While the Greeks and the Romans looked back to a glory that had waned, the disciples of Jesus, after the Resurrection, looked forward to progress and victory. For other religions the golden age of the world is in the past. Christianity ever presses on with its look to the future.

In Westminster Abbey there is a splendid white marble sculpture in memory of Handel the musician. He is composing his famous oratorio, "The Messiah." Above, in the heavens, is an angel playing on a golden harp. Handel's face is turned upward, and as he catches the heavenly strains, he writes the words: "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The thought portrayed is that the Risen Saviour is alive forevermore, inspiring and leading his disciples on the earth.

THIS is the great Easter lesson. We have a risen and living Saviour ever present with us. And as this assurance made heroes and conquerors of the early believers, so should it gird and strengthen us today.

Great as are the obstacles confronting the Church in our time, if every Christian but caught the inspiration of the Easter Gospel, if we but realized the presence and leadership of the living, glorified Christ, these opposing forces would speedily be overcome by our irresistible might.

The Resurrection has ever been the motive force of missionary zeal. Animated and sustained by it, men and women have risked their lives to proclaim the greatest victory of time to those pining in darkness and the shadow of death. Nor can any true Christian keep this glad, blessed truth sleeping in his heart. Christ has risen. He lives in you and me. This is the glorious Easter Gospel. Let it awaken within us a joyous faith; a newness of zeal, a rededication of service, that Christ may show forth in our lives of active piety on earth, and that we may rise and reign with him in the life forevermore.

Discovering the Word of Life

SUNDAY, March 31. Ps. 119:71. "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes." The Word of God waits upon life, and it unlocks new treasure at the magic touch of appropriate circumstance. Some happening in our life proves to be the key to a closed casket, and when we bring the happening and the Word together the casket is opened, and the spiritual treasure is disclosed.

It is by no means needful that the key should be a heavy iron key, the symbol of some black experience. It can be a golden key, such as is used on some gay and festive day when we open a church or some home of cheery entertainment. Some brilliant happening in our life can discover wealth in Bible fields which we have never seen before. A triumph can open out a doxology. A joy can be like the first sunny ray that struck the statue of Memnon and elicited response.

But the surprise is more surprising when some harsh happening smites the rock and the sweet, refreshing water gushes forth. It has happened ten thousand times that a dark experience has discovered divine promises which we had never seen or scarcely noticed in the brighter days. We did not know the light was in the ear until we entered the tunnel. Some little psalm begins to shine! Some word of the Master begins to blaze like phosphorus in the dark waters! Some word of an apostle rises upon our darkening twilight like the evening star! And we begin to learn God's statutes in our afflictions.

It is a wise practice, if I may so put it, to expect these surprises of revelation. "The Lord hath yet more light and truth to break forth from His holy Word." Let us be on the lookout for it. Let us expect that each novel experience, whether it be grave or gay, is appointed to be a minister of revelation, and let us turn to the Word and watch for the unveiling. Let us regard our circumstances as the servants of our souls.

Living Sacrifices

MONDAY, April 1. Rom. 12:1. "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." It were worth while to study the "beseechings" of Paul. These are the points in his letters which are most fatherly, most lover-like. Masterful man as he was, he was moved to passionate tenderness by the grace of God. The first verse in this chapter strikes the key-note of practical Christianity. Some months before the great war commenced, an Englishman, much interested in religion, visited America, and at the close of his visit said, "I fail to hear the note of sacrifice struck in American religion." He had found the weak point in American religious life. Too few of us take our religion seriously. The average Christian probably spends more time and more money in seeking recreation than he spends in seeking the kingdom of God and God's righteousness.

Most of us know what it is to make sacrifices in order to found a business enterprise. The greatest merchant in America began his business career on so small a scale that he did his own delivering in a handcart. Multitudes of people know what it is to sacrifice in order to get an education. The most successful young physician in one of the great cities of America boarded himself during his college course and breakfasted regularly on a bowl of crackers and milk. The world is learning what it is to sacrifice for the sake of patriotism. Fifty millions of men in the nations now at war are presenting their bodies living sacrifices. One in every ten of them has already crowned that sacrifice, sealed that covenant with his own blood.

Sacrifice for the sake of sacrifice has absolutely no virtue, but sacrifice for high ends becomes within itself a religious act. No one of us can deprive himself of anything he holds of value, surrender anything he would care to keep, abstain or refrain from anything which would give him pleasure, devote time or strength to a good cause, cast his influence into the balances and save a lost cause, for duty's sake, for the sake of high sentiment, for the sake of loyalty to Jesus Christ, who does not thereby approach the sacrificial altar of the Invisible and Eternal God.

Proof and Faith

TUESDAY, April 2. John 20:29. "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Besides the peculiar warning which these words of the risen Lord conveyed to doubting Thomas, there is a larger meaning in them that applies to the Church in all ages. Our Lord by no means has sanctioned a kind of faith that does not seek convincing information regarding the matters to be believed. The Lord himself offered Thomas the evidence which led to the doubting disciple's glad and adoring profession: "My Lord and my God."

The Bereans who subjected the preaching of Paul to the test of the Scriptures are commended for so doing. "Prove all things!" is a standing rule among Christians. There is indeed a vast difference between skepticism which habitually questions and impugns the validity even of the best evidence that can be offered, and the spirit of examination which is eagerly seeking for that very evidence and is glad when it obtains the evidence. Doubt is not a necessary element in the search after truth, but that search can be instituted with devout reverence. Doubt, however, leads to unbelief, if not promptly checked. The searching of the Scriptures in which a believer is engaged is not for the purpose of detecting flaws in God's Book, or for having his misgivings concerning points in his creed verified, but to dissipate any fears that he may have entertained and to have his faith vindicated afresh.

It is to faith that God has appealed in all ages, and the evidence which He has offered to faith has been in all ages in the word that He has spoken. The evidence for faith in the Lord's resurrection was available in God's word before ever Christ rose from the dead, and Cleopas and his companion were reminded of this fact on Easter Day and reprimanded for their slowness of heart to believe all that Moses and the prophets had spoken regarding the matter.

The Martyr Spirit

WEDNESDAY, April 3. Dan. 3:18. "But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." Every true follower of Christ has the martyr spirit. He does not seek to redeem his life with the loss of his integrity. The convictions of these Hebrew heroes had reached permanency; not a nerve trembled in face of the fiery furnace.

Are there not other fires as hot as the Babylonian burnings? Job in suffering could say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in Him." Paul, before the bloody ax, exclaimed, "I am ready to be offered; I have fought a good fight." Jesus warned His disciples not to be afraid of them that kill the body.

The shield of faith protects every one as it did these Hebrew martyrs. The form of the Fourth is with you in every fiery crucible, which only burns away the bonds and purify the spirit. Are not many persons silent in the presence of moral evil who should speak? But they fear to offend the king, the party, the social customs, the Babylonian usages. They compromise until influence becomes paralyzed.

"I will take away your property," said the judge to Cyrian of Carthage. "You cannot," he replied, "for my treasure is in heaven." "Then I will banish you." "You cannot, for I can go nowhere where Christ is not with me." "Then I will take your life." "You cannot, for my life is hid with Christ in God."

Huss died for the truth; Luther lived for the truth. Let God decide which it will be for you. Some trust in princes, in powers of state, but we will trust in the God of love. He will deliver us. If we suffer with Him, we shall reign with Him in glory.

Good That Is Evil Spoken Of

THURSDAY, April 4. Rom. 14:16. "Let not your good be evil spoken of." The first step in the program of the Christian life is, Cease to do evil. The second is, Learn to do good. The third is, Learn to do good in such a way as to commend religion to the world. Some otherwise good people fail to appreciate the importance of right methods of being good and doing good.

Our good is often evil spoken of because of our thoughtlessness. The woman who looked askance at a stranger who had been shown into her pew did not really mean to hurt that stranger's feelings, to send her away from church that day with the inward resolution never again to enter its doors, but such was the effect of her lack of thought. Our good is often evil spoken of because of the unnecessary harshness of our manner. It is an oft repeated excuse of offenders of this kind, "I was born with an unfortunate disposition; I am brusque, and have no fineness of touch; it is hereditary." This is an attempt to dodge responsibility, to transfer the censure to our ancestors—who cannot defend themselves. Harshness of manner may be temperamental, but it is hardly constitutional. It is an ungracious and harmful habit, and it can be cured. Those who ride roughshod over other people's sensitive feelings need to take a new lesson in the school of the compassionate Christ.

Sometimes our good is evil spoken of because of our lack of charity—not the charity that feeds and clothes the poor, but the charity that Paul speaks of, the love that "suffereth long and is kind." It was an oft-quoted saying of a distinguished jurist, the late Judge Joseph A. S. Mitchell of Indiana, "We can not be like God in justice, power, wisdom or holiness, but we can be like Him in being merciful."

Tasting God's Goodness

FRIDAY, April 5. Ps. 34:8. "O taste and see that the Lord is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in him." The fact that God is good and that his tender mercies are over all his things may be grasped by the intellect of man upon inspection of God's creation and his benevolent providence. Men may be excited to admiration and eloquent praise of God by observing with what lovingkindness he directs the affairs of the universe. But a far deeper appreciation of the goodness of God is obtained by our personal experience of his favor.

The proof of God's goodness is made by man's trust in him. When we take God at his word, when we see in his general promises specific offers of help for our particular needs, and risk to place ourselves unreservedly in his almighty and wise hands, we shall, like David, become blessed people.

Men's curses are turned into divine benedictions for us. This blessing comes to believers through Jesus Christ, in whom the grace and lovingkindness of God has appeared. To the saints in the Old Testament Jesus was not revealed as directly as to us. They were taught the goodness and mercy of God by types and emblems. But the revelation of God's goodness which they had received proved sufficient to fill their hearts with intense satisfaction and their mouths with eloquent praise. Ought not the fuller revelation which we of the new dispensation have received of the grace abounding make us far more efficient expositors of the goodness of God?

The Mission of Beauty

SATURDAY, April 6. Eccles. 3:11. "He hath made everything beautiful in his time." Beauty is one of the outer doors of the temple of the soul, where God first knocks for admittance. The flowers and foliage, the trees and hillsides, the rivers and valleys, are spread out to awaken the love of the beautiful in human hearts. Music and painting, sculpture and architecture, poetry and song, are ministering spirits of heavenly origin to arouse the beauty of holiness in the soul.

The mission of beauty is divine, leading on the admirer, entranced with loveliness, until he sees the King in His beauty and falls in love with the Lover of his being. If beauty aids worship in earthly temples, how much more in the heavenly? If the soul, being attracted by the beautiful, possesses also the power to picture grand portraits of nature's glories for itself and others, then we become like nature and nature's God, beauty being the handmaid leading us up to the Divine. Stars are more inspiring than clouds; sunlight than shadow, but love is greater than beauty.

The true and the good are married by the beautiful standing between and illuminating both. The universe being a temple of beauty, some have worship only for the sublime edifice, forgetting to bow in adoration before the King within. Though the heavens declare the glory of God, they are not Himself. A banquet with the King is infinitely more to be desired than to feast the eyes upon His robes and riches, for the golden sunsets, the awakening day, the dewy jewels of the morning, the birds and flowers are but reflections of the beauty of holiness from the face of the Christ.

The Measure of a Man

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

Author of "The Witness"

CHAPTER I

THE house was old-fashioned, and darkly pleasant, set back from the street with a stretch of lawn, and a wide veranda in front of one wing. There was moss on the roof where the tall elms hung over, and there was a quiet air of dignity about it. A comfortable hammock swung between two resinous pines near the dining-room veranda, with a carpet of needles beneath; a couple of magazines and a book lay in the hollow of the hammock ready for use.

At the left of the quaint old front door with its double-settled stoop a young girl in white was stooping over a pansy bed picking the riotous bloom, and above her in the tallest elm a thrush was uttering translucent notes. They seemed to thrill and find an echo in her heart. She made a lovely picture against the dark of the old house with the morning light playing over her hair and bringing out red and gold threads in its brownness.

Suddenly a whistle, clear and sweet as the bird's, interrupted the thrush, and the color sprang to the girl's cheeks. This was what she had been half waiting, hoping for, fearful lest it would not come. She turned and rose, her hands overflowing with pansies, her eyes bright with welcome. Yes, there he was, her old friend and comrade of the childhood years, come back after four years of college abroad for his summer at the old family country-seat, and he had not forgotten her! He had come the first morning, at once, to see her!

He swung the gate open joyously, shouting, "I thought I'd find you here, Janet," and stepped aside to let his companion pass—a girl in pink with a fluffy parasol. Janet had not noticed the other girl until then. A kind of cool dignity seemed to fall upon her as she looked, and she came forward slowly, with welcome in her face but with a reserve in her eyes that had not been there a moment before.

THE girl at the gate had apparently not seen her at all. She was mincing along on her little high-heeled white pumps and discoursing most absorbedly with the young man, giggling contagiously, and gazing up into his face from beneath her tilted parasol in a most compelling way, fairly obliging him to pay some attention to her in spite of the fact that he was evidently all eagerness to greet his old friend. She was golden-haired, blue-eyed, with a ravishing artificial complexion; her costume was most elaborate and diaphanous, well calculated to make the natives of the simple village stare. Janet had full opportunity to study her, and to note the changes that four years had made in her old friend, Harley Bruce, before the three were actually face to face and the young man had grasped her hand and was eagerly looking into her eyes. There was something in his look that might have made her catch her breath had they been alone, but she was conscious of an appraising stare from the eyes of the baby-doll by his side that steadied her self-control.

"Let me make you acquainted with Lotta Lomond," said young Bruce lightly, as if to get rid of a trifling duty; and the beauty by his side swept her lashes down and up again, with an impertinent tilt to her chin, in acknowledgment of the introduction, and continued to stare appraisingly, impudently, half resentfully, at Janet, as if she were an annoying interruption that must be got rid of.

There was nothing, however, about Janet's costume to merit the criticism of her visitor. Her linen frock with its simple lines was of a cut and fashion that showed it had never been bought nor made in that town. Lotta Lomond's eyes lingered on the details of pocket and girdle and button long enough to be surprised at that. The white suede rubbersoled, heelless oxfords and silk stockings were irreproachable, and the face of this country girl was undeniably beautiful. As she stood there beside the visitor with her fresh for mamma. You said you were coming in for a minute on an errand. Come, get it done and let us go on to the store quickly!" Her tone was quite possessive, as if Harley were her special property. Janet looked at her wonderingly. Could it be that Harley had chosen her, was engaged to her, perhaps? Her eyes widened with the thought.

Lotta Lomond turned to the simple country girl with a half contemptuous simper.

"Men are so irresponsible, aren't they, Miss Grayson? Come, Harley, hurry up!" and she poked him playfully with her parasol.

Harley frowned, but his natural courtesy forbade his showing his annoyance further. If his mother had taught him anything, it was to be polite.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, Lotta. I didn't know you were in a hurry. Of course, if you must, but that hammock looks good to me. However, it's only a delayed pleasure. We've a great deal to talk over, you know, Janet. Four years is a long time. Well, if I must hurry: we came over to tell you the plans for the day. Mother's got a crowd over at the house and we're to take an auto trip right after lunch, returning in time to dress for dinner. This evening I believe they have an impromptu play on hand. We want you to join us, of course. Don't say you've anything else on hand, for we simply won't take no for an answer. And we'll call a little after one for you. Will that be all right? If I get a chance I'll run over again this morning just to talk over old times a bit. But you'll be ready at one, anyway, Janet?"

ALTHOUGH Janet gave a tacit consent she was inwardly seized with an aversion to accepting the invitation, and she watched the two go down the walk—Lotta already simpering and gazing absorbedly into her companion's face—with a growing feeling that the afternoon's excursion would not be to her liking. As they opened the front gate she almost called after Harley to say she would not go, and then held herself gently in reserve, questioning her own motives severely. What was this feeling struggling wildly in her heart? Jealousy? Was she jealous of Harley's friendliness with this offensive young person? If it was jealousy she must take herself in hand and put a stop to it. This was no broadminded way to go into life, stopping aggrieved because some other girl had come on the scene.

Harley had been away four years. It stood to reason he would have new friends. He might even be engaged. She had told herself that before she knew he was coming, yet it had not hurt, not like this. What was it that made her heart freeze up at sight of this over-dressed doll walking with Harley? Was it because she did not look his equal, did not appear to be a friend worthy of her old friend? She walked slowly over to the hammock and sat down trying to think it out. She hoped this was the reason. She did not like to think she was just plain jealous of any girl that happened to have his friendship. There had never been any love-making between herself and Harley Bruce. It had just been a delightful boy-and-girl comradeship, a rare one, in which each shared the other's pleasures and joys, studies and interests, holidays and work; but still no romance about it. Janet liked to think a friendship like that could have outlasted the separation and come back unchanged, without anything to spoil it. Whatever the future held for them, she wanted to keep the past. Harley grown up, with a foreign education, and herself grown complexion, her easy graceful manner, the sunlight falling over her rich brown hair and her hands overflowing with pansies, it was like a rose looking at a bunch of cotton flowers on a last year's hat. Lotta Lomond, half conscious of the disadvantage, stared to disconcert the other girl. It was an old weapon of hers against all rivals. It seldom failed. But there was something about this cool gray-eyed girl that seemed impervious to a stare. It was Lotta Lomond, not Janet Grayson, who felt uncomfortable. Nevertheless she succeeded in creating an atmosphere that Harley Bruce had never known before when he was in Janet's company, and he looked uneasily from one girl to the other and wondered what was the matter.

He swung the gate open joyously, shouting, "I thought I'd find you here, Janet"

"Hello! Is that the same old hammock!" he cried. "Shan't we go over and have a good old-time talk? Can I get some chairs, Janet?"

BUT Lotta Lomond asserted herself decidedly. "Indeed, Harley, that's quite impossible. I'm in a great hurry to get back with that embroidery silk up, with a college education in one of the finest American institutions, might not be so perfectly suited to one another's ideals as the boy and girl Harley and Janet had been; but she liked to think that the past, beautiful as it had been, would not be hurt in any way. And here, right off at the start, she was putting up a show of jealousy toward a little pink and white butterfly of a girl that she didn't know the first thing about! What in the world was the matter with her? Well, she would go that afternoon and try to get a different attitude. She would show them all that she and Harley were grand friends, and she would show that Lotta Lomond girl that she was broader than to mind her foolish little impertinences. She would be herself and make them all like her, and show Harley she was his old comrade, ready to join in with his friends as she had been to love his dogs and horses and stray rabbits in the old days.

NEVERTHELESS it was not with a very cheerful face that she went to make ready for her afternoon; and her mother, watching furtively, anxiously, asked at last, gently, as if she were not really noticing much:

"Didn't Harley come over yet?"

"Oh, yes, he came."

Janet drew the faintest, most imperceptible bit of a sigh as she said the words. Her mother flashed a quick keen glance at the girl's drooping face.

"What's the matter, dear? Is he changed?" she asked after a moment. It was what she had been fearing ever since she heard the Bruces were to open the old house and come back for the summer after all the years of absence.

"Oh, no," said Janet quickly, with hurried alarm. "At least not that I noticed," she added lightly. "But, you see, he had a girl with him, a very dolled-up person from the house-party, and she wouldn't give us a chance to speak, scarcely. It was disappointing, of course, not to be able to talk a little; find out what he had been doing and all that; but then, of course, I wouldn't have cared to talk over old times before a stranger; and it would have been rude, too, even if we had wanted to. Harley said he would run over again this morning if he got time, though I thought I saw a look in that baby-doll's eyes that didn't mean to let him. But he'll get here later, of course. He seemed awfully glad to get back, and he's looking fine, older, of course, and more manly, but just altogether what you'd expect. They came to ask me to go motoring this afternoon and to come to dinner afterward. They are getting up some kind of a play," she finished bravely, having made out quite a good case for her old friend.

THE mother's face relaxed.

"Oh, he came to get you, then! Well, of course, he has to pay some attention to his mother's guests, and you can't expect him to run away and leave them right off the minute he gets here. Of course, he isn't a boy any more. He is the host of the house. Why, I think it was very nice of him to come so soon even for a minute! I'm glad they asked you. You've had a dull time this spring. But of course they would ask you," she added with an anxious glance toward her daughter which softened into the old look of love and admiration. Why shouldn't they ask her? She was a girl to grace any occasion.

But Janet hadn't noticed the slip. She was trying to remember just how Harley had looked when he first took her hand in greeting.

"I'm glad we got you those two extra evening dresses," said her mother with satisfaction. "You'll be over there a great deal now, I suppose."

"I don't know, mother. I'm not so sure," said Janet thoughtfully. "I can tell better after this afternoon is over." And she went upstairs to get ready.

IT was a perfect day, and Janet, as she drew on her pretty blue motor cap, glanced from the window where the big motor car was just in sight and could not help a thrill of joyful expectancy in spite of all her forebodings. She noticed with relief that the front seat beside Harley, who was driving, was vacant. Then he meant to have her sit with him, and they could have a good old-fashioned talk and bridge the years of their separation. Perhaps after that she would not feel so strange.

She lingered just a second to admire the grace with which he swung his big form from the car and hurried up the brick walk to the house, with all the apparent eagerness of his old boyhood days. Then she ran quickly down to meet him.

The introductions to the rest of the party had just been performed, and Harley was about to help her in the car, when her mother called from the front door, holding out her forgotten motor veil. The young man sprang back to get it, lingering a moment to speak to Mrs. Grayson.

It was while Janet's back was turned for just that instant looking to see what her mother wanted that a sudden change took place in the car. When she turned back again Lotta Lomond was climbing nimbly into the front seat, and the young man whom they called "Tad" who had sat beside her had stepped out and was holding the door open for Janet to take the seat beside him in the middle of the car.

Janet looked up in dismay, met the saucy challenge of Lotta's cold eyes, hesitated, looking back toward Harley, and then, seeing nothing else to do, stepped in and quietly sat down in the seat indicated.

If Harley wished to change the arrangement when he came he would know what to do.

Harley certainly did not look pleased when he came striding back.

"What's the idea of the change?" he asked, glaring back at Janet's companion. "I thought we were all nicely fixed."

Lotta pouted.

"Tad was bad," she declared childishly. "He had a grouch on and wouldn't talk. Besides, I adore sitting in the front seat, and I've a lot of questions to ask you."

With a troubled look toward Janet, Harley took his seat and sent the machine flying down the street, but Janet noticed he did not smile nor respond to Lotta's chatter.

Janet sat back and tried to keep from showing her disappointment. The afternoon had suddenly lost all zest. But of course she must be agreeable to Harley's friends, and there would surely come a time pretty soon when she and Harley could renew their acquaintance unhindered. She took stock of the company for a moment.

THERE were two pretty girls on the back seat, sisters, Rose and Lily Gardner by name, and a young Mr. Thatcher, whom they called "Billy," squeezed between them. He was stout, with billowy elbows, and lolled without much regard to the ladies, who, however, appeared to enjoy it. He wore loud garments and gaudy jewelry.

At their feet sprawled a second young man, named Eddie Love, who was much engaged in tying Miss Lily Gardner's shoe, amid many screams and giggling reproofs. The four were utterly oblivious of Janet's presence. She turned to the man by her side and found him regarding her with a curious, amused stare, as if he had been waiting for her to discover him.

He was older than Harley by ten years, with handsome, heavy features, dark, limpid eyes, and an air of being bored with a world to which he felt infinitely superior. They called him "Tad," but she presently discovered that his name was Thaddeus Wiltrone. His arm was stretched across the back of Janet's seat familiarly, and he looked at her now with that steady impudence that some men of the world affect. Janet felt an instant aversion for him, but controlled it. She must not let her childish disappointment influence her judgment.

"You surely never belong to this dull little hole of a town!" remarked the man, with that intimate searching gaze and privileged tone that forces its way offensively into the citadel of the soul. Janet felt an odd desire to throw something at him and in spite of her best efforts an angry flush stole slowly into her cheeks.

"I was born in Springdale," she answered haughtily, in a quiet tone of withdrawal that invited no further question.

"But you never stayed here all your life," went on the offensive tone, the bold eyes still upon her face as if he would read her mind.

"I have lived here always except when away at school or college!" still haughtily.

"Of course! I knew you had been away. You have the sophisticated air that can never be cultivated in a dump like this. You never find a perfect specimen of womanhood like yourself in a country village."

JANET felt herself growing angrier than she had ever been in her life before. If it had not been for the determination to make the best of the afternoon she would have asked Harley to put her out of the car at once. But after all, was she to fly from the first insolent man who crossed her path? Had she not enough dignity to command respect from any man? Could she not be mistress of even a situation such as this? It was plain he took her for a very young country lass, with a trifle of education, who could be easily reduced to foolishness by a few compliments. She turned to him with a swift little lifting of her sweet brows, and a cool indifferent tone. He should not see that she was annoyed at his presumption.

"You do not like our little village, I take it."

Her eyes swept the vista of the long shaded avenue lingeringly, and somehow she conveyed the impression that it mattered very little to her whether such as he liked her native heath or not.

"Could any one be said to really like a God-forsaken little dump like this?" he drawled. "Except, of course, such homesick creatures as my young friend Bruce here, who has come back, in spite of all his mother could do, hoping to be a boy again and find all the delights of childhood. He, of course, will soon discover his mistake and be as bored as the rest of us."

"Oh, you're mistaken," said Janet lightly. "It's not a God-forsaken town. We have three churches here, and the majority of the people still believe in the Bible. It strikes me that you will find many of the cities much more God-forsaken than Springdale. Most of us are very fond of it, or we should not be here, you know. Did you ever hear of the man who planted a row of sour, gnarly apple-trees all around his orchard of choice apples, so that people who wanted to steal would look at them first and taste them, and not think it worth going farther? Perhaps Springdale doesn't have all its beauties right on the outside, for any chance comer. You have to get into the secret of it before you can enjoy it. Most things that are worth while are like that, don't you think?"

But Mr. Wiltrone merely stared. What manner of girl was this in sweetly simple garments, with a face like a child angel, and the unconscious calm of a woman of the world, who presumed to talk to him with such assurance? He almost suspected hidden irony, yet her face was so innocent, the outline of her profile so pure, one could scarcely believe she intended it.

THEY were passing through the brief business part of the village; a placid cluster of market, post-office, dry goods and grocery stores. Down the street, hobbling grotesquely between his good foot and his poor twisted short leg, jerked along the village cobbler. He was a feature of the town, a little crippled man who had grown old in the service of the villagers, and they all loved him. Not a young man or maiden of the time but had loved to stand at his low broad window and watch him cobbling shoes, sitting crosslegged on his little stool. Not one but had hoarded with joy bits of red and blue and white leather scraps that he had given them. Janet and Harley had been among those who hung about his charmed window and carried their bits of leather back to get "Old Gimpy" to pierce them with wonderful round holes with his awl. Gimpy was as much a part of the village to Janet and Harley as the streets and the mountains round about, and they always hailed him with smiles and happy salutations.

Suddenly Lotta Lomond pointed a dainty finger straight at the gray-headed cripple and laughed a gay carol of derision:

"Oh! Oh!" she shouted, "Look at the hoppyity man! Tad! Tad! Just look at that funny hoppyity man! Doesn't he look for all the world like the cricket you caught this morning and pulled off his hind leg? Look! Look! Did you ever see anything so funny in all your life!"

She was almost screaming with laughter, and her words rang out clearly as they passed the old man hopping along with his cane. Thaddeus Wiltrone arose from his seat and stared languidly, amusedly back at the cripple, who had stopped on the walk and was gazing after them with sad comprehension in his face.

Janet leaned forward and touched the other girl on the shoulder:

"Please don't!" she said earnestly, "That's our little shoemaker, and he's very sensitive about his deformity."

HER lips were trembling, her cheeks were flushed, and her eyes were bright with excitement. Miss Lomond turned around and looked at her in astonishment. Then her cherry lips curled in a scornful sneer:

"Oh, pardon me!" she drawled, "I wasn't aware he was one of your friends!"

"He is!" said Janet quite simply. "He's been a friend ever since I was a little girl and he made my first pair of doll's shoes. I wouldn't have his feelings hurt for anything!"

As Janet sank back in her seat she suddenly became aware of Harley glaring angrily at Miss Lomond.

"For heaven's sake, Lotta! Haven't you any sense at all?" he snapped. Then to Janet:

"Was that old Gimpy, Jan?"

But before Janet could reply Lotta's laugh rang out derisively:

"Oh, Harley! Excuse me! I might have known I would be stepping on your toes. I suppose, now, that queer old creature is a friend of yours too?"

"He certainly is!" roared Harley, to Janet's infinite relief. Then Harley did care, after all! He hadn't quite lost his old love for Springdale and Gimpy and the dear old days!

"Give me a cigarette, Harley, I want a smoke!" announced Lotta suddenly, and pounced on Harley's nearest pocket. "Have one, girls?" she said.

JANET sat rigid, trying not to show her disgust. The girls with whom she companioned did not think respectable women smoked. It happened to be her first experience in the company of girls. "Tad" was studying her features, leisurely inhaling smoke and puffing out little rings that floated almost into her face.

The back seat struck up a drinking song with shouts of hilarious mirth and riotous laughter. The car was passing the homes of several of Janet's mother's friends, where members of the family were sitting on the piazzas and looking up curiously as the party skimmed by. Janet's cheeks grew red with shame lest they should recognize her in such company; with an underlying trouble also in her heart lest they should recognize Harley and misjudge him thereby.

In the midst of it all Harley sat silent, driving like mad. He had long ago exceeded the speed limit. He had cast one quick apprehensive glance at Janet and settled into grim silence.

SOFT on the distance appeared a white house set in green acres on the edge of a small village. Janet looked with longing eyes as it drew rapidly nearer. Oh, if she were sitting on that quiet porch talking to Aunt Nan.

Quietly, unnoticed, Thaddeus Wiltrone had passed his arm along the back of Janet's seat. Now he drew it nearer to her, quite carelessly at first, as if it might have been pure accident, until his puffy white hand finally rested ever so lightly against Janet's shoulder, with just a hint of tendency to go further if encouraged.

Janet suddenly sat up very straight and leaned forward, touching Harley lightly on the shoulder.

America's Hand to Russia

PRESIDENT WILSON'S brief message to the Russian Soviets is voluminous with meaning. It is not to Russia alone, but contains special hints to Germany, to Japan, to England and France, not to be mistaken. It deals not with expediency but with justice and righteousness. It is fitted both to war and to peace.

It is fitting that Russia, which has ever lent to our nation the hand of friendship, should now in her extremity see extended to her our hand of gratitude and brotherly love. Traditional friendship is a high consideration, but President Wilson has found still higher ones to act upon. The right of Russia to "complete sovereignty and independence in her own affairs and full restoration to her great rôle in the life of Europe and the modern world" is a transcendent consideration, as is also the right of all peoples, great and small, to "become masters of their own life." The concern here shown is not for the shifting lines of empire, but for the fixed, straight line of principle. World thought is lifted up into the purifying and propelling current of moral forces.

It is unthinkable that the Russian people should have been left to their fate unhelped. That their plight is due largely to their own folly makes them all the more subject to our sympathy, patience and helpfulness. Russia needs humanity and humanity needs Russia.

To the Allies, Russia has ceased to be an asset and become a liability. The giant of whom so much was expected, and who long fought so valiantly, now lies among our casualties, not to be deserted in disress and despair. It is too soon to forget that 2,000,000 Russians gave their lives to our cause.

Our President's message of hope and courage can hardly fail to meet response from the breaking heart of Russia; but, whatever the result there may be, the spirit and force of this message of faith and freedom must make a profound impression upon all other peoples. In darkened Russia it may relight the candle of reason; whether it does this or not, to ourselves and to the world it is a ringing reaffirmation of our high purpose in the war and in the peace to follow.

It has its special meaning to our own people. We have known from the first that we would accept no aggrandisement from this war. We know now that we will shirk no responsibilities in it.

The Palestinian Problem

NOW that Jerusalem is held by the Allies, it constitutes a great and immediate problem. In the past, the Christian Church has done all too little for Palestine. What a glorious opportunity is now open since it has become accessible to systematized effort! Land of the prophets, the apostles, the early martyrs, birthplace of the faith we love and cherish, it ought to be and it must be first in our thoughts, our prayers, our godly enterprise. It would seem that the whole Christian world owes a thank-offering to God for lifting the bonds of the infidel from the Holy City, and that this cannot be better paid than by a union of the Christian nations to make the emancipation complete and glorious.

There are many splendid features that might form a part of the work of restoring the ancient land. True Christianity works with the hand and the head, as well as with the heart, and the new Palestine should become a field for loving and ceaseless effort on the part of God's people, until it blossoms with schools, hospitals and useful industries, and until the waste places are fully redeemed and made like a fruitful garden. Every blessing that love can devise should be its endowment, for the world owes more to Palestine and its people than it can ever repay.

In this crusade, greater and nobler than all its predecessors, the Christian Herald should have a definite part. It has had a ministry to the orphan children of China, India, Japan, Armenia and other lands. Its readers have reached out literally to the "utmost parts" with their prayers and their hands of helpfulness. And it would be to them a logical and a very precious work were they to found in Jerusalem an orphanage for the little ones, some of whom may be the descendants of those children in that far-off time, whom Jesus took upon his knee and blessed.

All up and down through Syria, from Aleppo to Damascus and from Cairo to ancient Moab, the need of missionaries is being emphasized by our missionary leaders in Christian lands. That there will soon be a great enlistment for Gospel service not only in Turkey, but in Arabia, China, Japan, Northern Africa and the Balkans is assured. In many places the devastation of war makes the work of mission rehabilitation a necessity. Depleted ranks must be filled and the battalions of workers augmented to urge forward, more energetically than ever, the task of the Great Commission. All the leading denominations are filling their treasuries for this forward movement, which is the chief business of the Christian world today. More and more is the conviction growing that if all our available wealth were expended upon it, it would be well spent, and the investment would bring the richest blessing.

The Stars of Service

SERVICE glorifies life. It gilds even the most commonplace surroundings. We are reminded of this the moment we look about us; everywhere, in the mansion of wealth, the humble cottage, the counting-room, shop, factory, foundry, church and library—our eye lights upon the Service Flag with its stars. Sometimes there is but a single star, indicating that one brave heart has gone out from that home to front fate in behalf of world freedom. Or it may be a whole cluster of stars that announce to the passers-by that some church or bank or great emporium has its band of heroes away "over there," absent but unforgetten.

A poet has sung of service in these sympathetic lines, which will touch many hearts at this time:

The little house is brown and down at heel,
The easements crumble, and the porches sag,
Complaining hinges hold a crooked gate
And from the chimney sullen smoke wreaths lag;
But, as I pass, within a window hung
I see a service flag with triple stars—
And all at once the walls grow tall and fair,
And not an ugly line their beauty mars;
Carved, stately pillars welcome at the door,
A beckoning finger from each chimney starts,
And, in a moment changed, the little house
Becomes a palace filled with royal hearts.

All honor to the stars of service on their snow-white field! Let us pay our tribute to the splendid self-sacrifice they represent. May their lustre shine undimmed and may they be there to wave a welcome to our returning heroes in due season.

Mrs. Lutz's New Serial

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers know and like the stories of Mrs. Grace Livingston Hill Lutz, and the coming of another serial from her pen is like the visit of an old, true friend that brightens the hours with entertaining and enlivening incidents of life.

"The Measure of a Man," beginning in this issue, increases in interest as the thread of the story strengthens. There are good character studies, surprising turns in the tide of fortune, love that is faithful through all suspense, and a happy conclusion.

Harley Bruce, who appears in the first chapter, holds the interest from first to last, growing in strength to the test which measures him as a man.

We assure all who begin this story now that they will find it of steadily increasing interest to the end.

The Power of Your Dollar

NEVER has any war in history caused such an outpouring of the manhood and wealth of the nations as the present struggle against despotism. The appeal it makes to the conscience of humanity is being answered with the same religious zeal that attended the raising of the Crusaders' armies.

The war has brought to every American a conviction of responsibility toward his government, and of personal concern in the welfare of the state. The wish to help in the winning of the war is none the less genuine because one does not happen to be among the millions who have gone into the army or the navy, the munitions plants or the shipyards. Nor is the desire limited to the great legion of women and girls registered with the Red Cross and the Food Administration, nor to the volunteers who labor for the Liberty Loans. This feeling is shared by hundreds of thousands of other loyal Americans who have heard the call to duty, and who are anxious to reply to it, but who do not know how to fit themselves into the intricate mechanism of modern warfare. They may be imbued with all the fire and zeal of true patriots and nevertheless find themselves standing by, unable to help. To this patriot the following is presented:

The economic output of America will win the war just as surely as the charge over No Man's Land. Each should seek to increase his productivity. It may not be that he is called upon to make airplanes, submarine chasers, gas masks or loaves of bread for the fighters. It may be that his particular job is just to add to the power of his dollars.

Some may think that their dollars have attained the maximum of usefulness and energy when they have bought food or clothing, or paid the rent bill, or the monthly commutation ticket. Briefly stated, the pre-war theory of money that was most popular was connected with the idea of "circulating the dollar." The thought is put thus vaguely, because it was held by many people in that indefinite form. Saving may be all right, it was conceded a bit doubtfully, but you had to be careful or you would start hoarding money and then where would the nation be? Rather than be accused of a desire to stow it away under the bed in a tin box, most men would let it slip out of their hands.

In this year of war, 1918, that easy-going principle is just as antiquated as the Monitor and the Merrimac. It cracks immediately under the strain of modern war economics. The dollar, a weapon of the most intense power, cannot be thrown away without thought. It must be used again and again. The dollar that used to go for luxuries is to be saved. Score one point for the owner of the dollar when he has put it aside. Then it is to be put into Liberty Bonds. Score one for the man in service, who is out-fitted and armed through the loans. The labor that is used in manufacturing the luxury can be turned in the direction of vital necessities that the Government wishes to produce for the Americans at the front. Score another for the soldier and sailor. In a great many cases, the material that went into the making of the luxury could be used for the same end. Score a third point for the fighting man. Thus the man who diverts his dollar from extravagance benefits himself once and his defenders three times. He is adding fourfold to the power of his dollar!

Blocking Prohibition

THE Assembly of New York State has voted for a referendum on the proposition of ratifying the National Prohibition resolution which was pending in that body. The Constitution provides distinctly that after the passage of the resolution by Congress, a ratification by two-thirds of the state legislatures is all that is needed to make it legal and operative. The referendum was the device of the liquor men to prevent the ratification of the amendment by the Assembly at a time when it seemed imminent. It appeared likely on March 14 that the New York Senate would concur in the proposal for a referendum, and that the Governor, although favoring ratification at once, would sign the bill. There is little doubt that the National Prohibitory resolution will be ratified by the thirty-six states necessary. It can even be done without the vote of New York and eleven other states besides. Yet stranger things have happened than for New York to ratify the resolution this year, as the Prohibition leaders hope, or if not now, then at some other session of the legislature within the seven years prescribed by the act. It is nowhere believed that this eleventh-hour strategy will save the situation for the liquor men, although it may delay it a little.

If the verdict of the whole people were to be fairly recorded, we believe that drink in America would be put out of sight not only for the period of the war, but for good and all. In a majority of the states and through Congress, the nation has already demanded that the drink traffic be curbed for the nation's welfare. Its permanent suppression is only a question of time. Surely, then, it is unwise and unpatriotic in the last degree to give to any class of citizens at this critical juncture the privilege of wasting our grain in the manufacture of drink when all the crops of the coming season will be insufficient to meet the imperative need. Even Germany has closed her breweries and turned them into meat-packing factories. We trust that Governor Whitman will use the veto on this referendum proposition. The whole situation is too grave to permit of such eleventh hour political tinkering.

War-Time Mottoes for American Homes

By the National Food Administration

... Make your home service reach the firing-line.
... We have to put every ounce of effort behind the men behind the guns.
... Any food consumed over and above the needs of the human body is wasted.
... From now until next harvest watch your grocery list or there will be no groceries to list.
... The man who grows more food adds to the wealth of the world; the man who grows dollars may be adding only to his own wealth.

Quails Starved and Frozen

THE terrible winter has been hard on the smaller varieties of wild life. In many districts the quails and rabbits have been starved and frozen to death in great numbers. The slaughter of large numbers of these creatures by the severe winter in Indiana and Illinois has been reported. The six weeks of snow and zero weather prevented the birds and rabbits from getting what corn is left in the fields or from going to the farmyards for feed. Weed seeds were covered up by the snow. Hawks, owls and foxes preyed upon the quail, which because of their starved and frozen condition could not get out of their way. A farmer in Indiana says he first noticed a few quail in his hog lot. The number increased day by day until eighty of them were roosting under an old shed and coming for food whenever the hogs were fed. On one farm the rabbits wore a path, more tunnel than path, from their burrow to the shocks of corn. In these regions where the game has been thinned by the winter many of the sportsmen have formed organizations to protect the quails and rabbits that are left even during the open season, which begins in November. There is a story of quails, not in decimated numbers, but in enormous quantities, furnished to the children of Israel for food on two occasions in the journey through the wilderness. The quails on passing from Europe into Asia appeared on the shores of the Red Sea and of the Mediterranean in immense numbers. The Lord caused a strong wind to drive countless numbers of these birds into the camp of Israel, where they were captured for food. There is this reference to it: "And the people stood up all that day, and all that night, and all the next day; and they gathered the quails." (Num. 11:32).

To Melt Silver Dollars

IT is in the mind of Congress to authorize the melting of 150,000,000 silver dollars now stored in the treasury to supply silver bullion for export to our Allies and to pay trade balances. Simultaneously, one and two dollar silver certificates now issued on the basis of the coins in storage will be withdrawn from circulation, and Federal and Reserve banknotes of the same denominations issued in their place. The silver dollars would be melted only as needed and eventually would be reminted from silver to be bought by the government during the next year. Legislation now drafted would authorize these measures and in addition would empower the treasury, through the director of the mint, to buy all the silver produced in the United States at a price to be determined by agreement with producers. The silver product during 1917 amounted to 74,000,000 ounces. It is the desire of the government to push it up to 100,000,000 ounces this year. There is a universal demand now for metal for monetary purposes, and to settle trade balances. And it is said there is an arrangement between our government and Great Britain to buy the output of the United States and possibly of the world to supply the need of the Allied nations at this time. From the earliest history of the race silver, next to gold, has been counted the most precious metal and has been used as money. There is this reference to the use of silver as a circulating medium very early in human history in the purchase of the tomb of Machpelah in which to bury Sarah: "And Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, four

Making Maple Sugar

THERE are as many as sixty varieties of the maple tree, which is found in the north temperate zone, notably in North America, the British Isles and India. Perhaps a half-dozen varieties yield sugar. The one supplying it the most abundantly is called the sugar maple (Acer saccharinum). The wood of the maple tree has a satiny appearance and is used extensively in making furniture. It is sometimes finely marked, with undulations of fiber, and is then, known as bird's eye maple, used in veneering. But at this time we stand under the maple trees not so much interested in the number of the species, or in the furniture it will make, as in the fact that it makes maple syrup and maple sugar, so delicious as articles of food. The trees are tapped in February, March and April, according to the locality and season, and when warm days and frosty nights encourage the flow of the sap, an augur hole is bored in the tree near the ground a half-inch deep at first, and gradually increased to two inches. A spout is driven into the hole and the sap runs into troughs or other vessels, from which it is carried to a boiler over a hot fire and boiled into syrup, to be used in that form, or poured into molds to make blocks of maple sugar. Four gallons of sap yield about one pound of sugar. A single tree yields from two to six pounds in a season. Rude sheds are constructed and a camp made in maple sugar time. Those raised among the maples will never forget the good old times they had in the sugar camp in the spring, and he who has had genuine maple molasses on his buckwheat cakes will never think of taking anything else if he can get that. Honey was the sugar of the Hebrews. There is no record that they had anything answering to our maple sugar, though they imported a cane similar to that from which our sugar is made. There is this reference to it: "To what purpose cometh there to me incense from Sheba, and the sweet cane from a far country?" (Jer. 6:20).

hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant." (Gen. 23:16.)

Bible Through Seven Wars

MRS. ALDEN CARVER NAUD, of Gordon, Wis., is the owner of a Bible which has had a most eventful history. It was printed in London 208 years ago and shortly after came into the possession of the Carver family, who have retained it ever since. It has figured in the history of the United States in a definite way, having been carried by representatives of the family to whom it belongs, through all the principal wars in which the country has engaged. It was first taken to the French and Indian War, and afterward passed safely through the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Philippine War, and and s's are similar. It is an interesting fact that the Bible has always been safely returned by the soldier who carried it away. We sincerely hope and pray that young Carver, after a heroic and victorious service, may be permitted to return safely to his family and bring back the historic Bible to his sister. As important to the soldier as uniform and gun, is the Bible, the food and inspiration of the soul, which tells how to live and die. To the patriots of the Carver family the holy Book they carried has verified this truth: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path." (Ps. 119:105).

Fence-Wire Bridge

THERE is a boisterous mountain stream in the West which is spanned by one of the most wonderful bridges in the world. It is not the heavy bridge for wagons and horses or motors or freight trains, but it is a suspension bridge for the tread of children's feet. In a certain community, the children had to cross this turbulent river to get to school, and boats had to be used to transport them, and this was quite dangerous. And so the citizens concluded to build a suspension bridge that would be inexpensive. They donated their work and had public entertainments to buy the fence wire necessary for the purpose. So they built the structure 662 feet in length, with the main span 380 feet and 63 feet above low water level. Out of the vigorous West come many beautiful examples of progress in the education of children, in mastery over nature, and in happy community life. It is remarkable that the word "bridge" is not mentioned in the Bible. They doubtless had bridges of some sort over some of the streams of Palestine. Ruins of a few have been found which are of Roman architecture. It is likely that the Jordan had at least two bridges, though the Scriptures make no mention of them. But most of the people crossed that river at places where it could be forded. There is this reference to the method of crossing the river: "And they went down after him and took the fords of Jordan toward Moab, and suffered not a man to pass over." (Judges 3:28.)

New Radio Spans Sea

A NEW wireless station just erected at Stavanger has succeeded in communicating easily with American stations in a trial. Regular trans-Atlantic service between Norway and the United States will be started whenever the American government grants permission. Stavanger is on an inlet of the North Sea on the west coast of Norway, 100 miles south of Bergen. From there to the nearest American point is about 3,300 miles. Science is making wonderful contributions to religion. The spade of the scholar, in digging among the ruins to find the doings of men, discovers the handwriting of God. The astronomer, in discovering and photographing new worlds, opens a door which reveals the face of the Almighty, the Maker of them all. The fact that a man can communicate with his fellow across an ocean either with or without a wire makes it easier to believe that man can talk to God, and God can talk to man, by the wireless of prayer. It requires as much faith to believe the one as the other, and one is as true as the other. The communication between a man in Norway and one in America by wireless illustrates the fact announced by one of the inspired writers, that God has sent the electrical current everywhere in the earth. "He directeth his lightning unto the ends of the earth." (Job 37:3.)

Fishing Boat Rescued

A DISABLED fishing schooner with sixty passengers and crew was towed to shore the other day by a coast guard cutter. The sea filled the engine room and stopped the motor. The vessel drifted all night in constant peril. Another boat in a storm was rescued long ago. "Then he arose and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm." (Matt. 8:26.)

The Desert Path By Margaret E. Sangster

The camel tracks led whitely across the desert sand,
And one came riding after with furtive mystery;
Ah, one came swiftly riding, a dagger in his hand,
And he was bent on plunder - a nomad thief was he!
He did not heed the starshine that glimmered from on high,
For laden beasts had traveled along the lonely way.
He did not see the glory that swept the Eastern sky,
For he had far to journey before the dawn of day.

He followed through the desert, and then at last he saw
An inn upon the outskirts of some small village place;
And there were camels resting before the stable door.
He left his horse, crept nearer, with greed upon his face;
And peering o'er the threshold, he saw that gold was piled,
With precious stones and incense, before a little Child.

II

A thief he was by calling, who to the stable came,
A thief whose youthful fingers had learned to steal their fill;
A thief he was who valued his heritage of shame,
Yet, standing by that doorway, he did not want to kill!
A thief he was, but watching - he saw a Baby face,
And, bending near, a Mother, whose joy was undefiled;
And for one breathless moment across the stable space,
The Baby's eyes gazed at him - and then the Baby smiled!

A thief he was by calling, but there beside the door
He saw a Holy Vision - he knelt and tried to pray -
And something, thrilling, whispered of love forevermore.
And then he rose, half-weeping - and it was Christmas Day!
A thief he was by calling, who felt the Father's plan,
But back across the desert there silent rode a man!

III

The years are met as milestones upon a winding road,
And some slip by like shadows, and some are fair with flowers;
And some seem dreary, hopeless - a leaden chain of hours -
And some are like a heart-throb, and some a heavy load.
The thief, a thief no longer, a lonely figure strode
Heart-weary down life's pathway, through tempests and through showers,
But always prayed that somewhere, among sweet-scented bowers,
A Baby's smile might show him where happiness abode.

For he was often hungry - a thief, reformed, must eat -
And there were folk who shunned him, and turned his plea away;
And there were those who scourged him from out the market place -
They were the ones who told him to earn his bread and meat!
Yet ever he walked onward, and dreamed of some fair day
When he would find the Christ-Child with love upon His face!

IV

Where work lay for the asking it seemed that men might work,
But prejudice was rampant in every shop and field,
And, "What if you are trying, my scythe you may not wield!"
Men told the thief, who answered - "Indeed, I will not shirk!"
And carpenters and builders turned from him with a smirk,
And farmers hurried by him to house the harvest's yield,
And so he took his dagger, all rusted, and his shield,

And sought again the highway where thieves and jackals lurk.
And yet the spark of manhood still flamed within his heart,
And still he saw the Baby, beyond the stable door;
And oftentimes at even, as crimson daytime died,
He knelt, a sorry figure, from all of life apart.
And, "Oh, if I could see Him - and feel His love once more,
"If I could see Him smiling, I would not steal!" he cried.

V

It was a glowing ruby that caused the thief to fall,
But - he was very hungry, and lonely, too, and cold;
And youth lay all behind him, a tattered funeral pall,
For he was very tired, and he was growing old.
It was a glowing ruby that lay upon the breast
Of one who had not earned it, who wore it with a sneer;
The thief was very weary, he only longed for rest;
He was too wan for caring, he was too numb for fear!

It was a glowing ruby - he held it in his hand -
His hand was thin and withered, it shook beneath the gem;
He took the vivid ruby, the ransom of a land,
And tied it firmly, tightly, within his garment's hem;
And then he shuffled forward, but like a thorn within
His soul he bore the torment of bitterness and sin!

VI

They caught him when the morning had tinged the Eastern skies;
The gem was found upon him, as red as guilty blood;
He stood, his head sunk forward, with listless, shallow eyes,
And hopelessness submerged him like some unholy flood;
A thief he was by calling. The law? The law was great;
What chance had he for pity? His fate was sealed and done;
He was unclean, an outcast, a menace to the state;
A thing to be avoided, a stain against the sun!

They led him to his hearing, the hall was still and light;
A judge was seated higher, who passed him with a glance;
And suddenly, forgetting his weariness and fright,
The thief cried, leaping forward, "I did not have a chance!"
The judgment hall was spacious, and coldly white and wide -
And coldly came the sentence - "He shall be crucified!"

VII

They nailed him, God's creation, upon a cross of shame;
They nailed him up with laughter, they heeded not his tears;
And people looking at him were moved to soulless jeers,
And agony was on him - a searing, breathless flame!
And then, as he hung sobbing, a sudden feeling came
Of peace that, reaching toward him across the sound of sneers,
Was like a burst of music that one more feels than hears -
For, from somewhere beside him, a Voice had breathed his name.

Ah, he was weak with anguish, and yet he turned his head,
And saw a cross beside him, and on the cross a Form;
And he forgot the tumult, the horror and the storm -
And someone, down below him, said "Look, the thief is dead!"
But, safe from fear and torture beyond their scornful cries,
The thief had gazed at Heaven in Christ's triumphant eyes!

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon
Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

CHAPTER XII

IT was Saturday night, and Agnes and Rose had left Howard in the study while they had gone down on the street to do a little shopping. Saturday night had always been a sacred time with Howard, whose habits demanded quiet for that period, on into the late hours, in preparation for Sunday preaching.

Tonight he was unusually abstracted and introspective. He sat gazing at the Christ, his whole being stirred to do and be as a disciple. But at the heart of his desire sat, grim and unmoved, this Red Hill problem of a community spirit. What good had his preaching done? The town was in the grip of tradition. The churches were a burden to the people, not a help. The very fact of so many spoke of the failure of their definition of Christianity. It was a reproach to the Master, a denial of his prayer that they might be one. And his own efforts were wasted. His own success spelled failure for his brethren in the ministry. Was it worth the effort? What hope to bring together a community that had no together spirit?

His soul gathered more and more in abstraction, removed from his outward surroundings, and he had never been more completely isolated, when he was startled by a loud ring at the door. He started up and, almost running out into the sitting-room, opened the door and confronted Lida's father, Mr. Wilson.

"May I see you a few minutes, Mr. Chase? I know it's Saturday, but—"

Mr. Wilson was a small, unobtrusive man, owner of the elevator and flour mill at Red Hill. Everybody said he had lots of money, but few people except the wheat-sellers had ever seen much of it. He had several times that summer and fall, in brief chance meetings with Howard, hinted at something in the way of a memorial to little Miss Wilson, but not even in his wildest dreams had Howard imagined so great a thing as quiet Mr. Wilson now proposed. He did it in a very few words.

"Mr. Chase, I have heard you speak more than once of a community center in Red Hill, a building into which all the people could gather for the common interests, and where various enterprises could be carried on like boy's club work—gymnasium, reading room, lecture hall, music, where the town administration and so forth could all be housed, a place the people could call their own, and into which and out of which could center the interested life of the place.

"Well, Mrs. Wilson and I have talked it over. We will start that idea by giving toward such a building the sum of $5,000, as a memorial to Lida. You were her greatest friend, outside the family. We feel as if this building would not only represent a memorial to our child, but be something you would know how to plan and carry on for the common good. Will you undertake this matter, if we can find others to join us, as I believe we can? For $10,000 we ought to be able to put up the proper building and equip it."

IF Mr. Wilson had come into his study and proposed to Howard that they unite to start a joint in Red Hill and send for a carload of beer at once, Howard could not have been more astounded. He was so overwhelmed by the fact of his longing coming true that for a few seconds he stared at Mr. Wilson without a word. Next minute he had him by the hand, and was trying to voice his feelings. Then, with his accustomed energy, he had seized a piece of paper and was sketching out in the rough his thought of the building and the various things to go into it. When Mr. Wilson finally went away, after modestly disclaiming any credit for his part in the memorial, he left behind an excited young minister pacing the little room exultantly, his heart singing hallelujah!

He could not compose himself to his sermon-making at once, but he had gone back to his desk to sit down, when the bell rang again. This time, to his surprise, it was the young Washburn College graduate farmer. He had never called on Howard before, but now he apologized as Howard eagerly, and in anticipation of something unusual, took him by the arm and drew him into the study.

When they were seated the farmer said, gazing with deep earnestness at Howard, "Mr. Chase, I owe you more than one apology for my selfish lack of cooperation in your plans for Red Hill; but the thing has been coming to a head with me all through the summer and fall, and I saw your light as I was driving home, and felt the impulse to come in and consult with you over a scheme following out your own idea of a community center where we can head up all the interests of the people in town and country. During the last two years I have been greatly prospered. I have talked over this with my wife, who is, as you know, a Washburn graduate. And we have agreed to put in, say, $2,000 to start with toward this community idea, helping to raise a building, if that is your thought, and really doing something to tie up the common life interests of all the people in town and out. We want to give a better account of our stewardship as educated Christians. We want to prove to ourselves, at least, that we are worthy of our Alma Mater and doing something to express our gratitude for all she did for us. We don't know how to do it better than in this way. I want to counsel with you about it."

HOWARD sat staring at him open-mouthed. If the Washburn graduate had proposed that he and Howard start a gambling hall down on the street over the post office he could not have been more bewildered. When he recovered himself he told the farmer about Mr. Wilson. Two excited young men got up and gripped each other's hands. As each of the men had been athletes in college the grip was fairly successful as a grip. Then they sat down and talked it over.

The farmer had been gone only a few minutes when Agnes and Rose came in. Without a word Howard put an arm about each and whirled them bewildered round and round. Then to prove he was not drunk or crazy he told them the fairy story of Mr. Wilson and the Washburn College graduate farmer. An excited parsonage group had little sleep that night. Howard swept his proposed sermon into the waste paper basket and next morning went into his pulpit and preached the community plan in a fiery, enthusiastic, but not visionary sermon that kept Judge Randolph awake most of the time and everybody else all the time, and closed in a thrilling announcement of Mr. Wilson's and the farmer's offer.

It was so great a surprise that the people took it in dead silence. Then they applauded. The Expressman told the Agent as they walked home that he never knew Mr. Wilson was worth over $10,000.

"That's going to be some building, accordin' to Mr. Chase. I gathered he intends to have everything in it except a joint. He plans a caverium and a movie and a swimmin' hole for the kids and I don't know what all. We'll all have to subscribe. Better get a move on your typewriter. Maybe you can get past that editor again when he ain't lookin'."

Matters moved fast after that memorable Sunday. The whole town woke up as never before in its history. During the week following Deacon Burton subscribed one thousand dollars. Judge Randolph and his wife put in five hundred dollars. But the surprise of the town was Deacon Allen. He came to Howard the next day after the sermon and put in his hand a check for two thousand dollars to be put into the Library part of the building, stipulating that no editions of the Bible go into it except the King James.

It was the most exciting week Red Hill ever knew or ever will know. Before another Sunday the ten thousand dollars had been subscribed, and more kept coming in from the country, due to the efforts of the Washburn College farmer, who kept his machine hot in a country canvass, and Howard called a mass meeting of the town to construt a committee, seek for plans, and consult generally.

There were some croakers and opposers. There always are for every plan ever proposed for human betterment. But Howard's enthusiasm, tempered by a great fund of practical common sense, had the right of way. The community idea had the right of way, too, and the town, for once in its life, sat down to a feast of imagination spread with the promise of idealism come true. Why are some people so afraid of the millennium coming to pass? Is anything more useful than the ideal, or more idealistic than the useful?

There was a good deal of speculation as to what would become of the churches under this community idea. Howard steadfastly held to the opinion that that problem would work out in time, and his opinion proved singularly true. Elder Noyes, after a series of experiences with the Board which do not belong to this story, was on the point of resigning from the ministry when Howard prevailed on him to stay on in Red Hill and take charge of one of the departments in the Community House. He proved to be unusually efficient as the Librarian and Director of Reading. Brother Harris, who had a gift with boys, gradually worked into the general management of the Playgrounds and Boys' Club Department. And Brother Gray, after various experiments, proved his great usefulness in directing the lecture and musical courses which have made Red Hill famous in Kansas. The churches did not combine at first except in a real union of common service in the Municipal and Community House. The Methodists, after endeavoring to hold together and even rebuild without the help of the Board, gradually came into Howard's congregation. One of the potent factors in this was the refusal on the part of the business men to subscribe to all the churches as they had done for years. And as time went on the plan of heading all the church organizations up into one gained more and more favor, so that within the next two years plans were under way to perfect that organization.

HISTORY was made fast during those two years. George Clark gave a vacant lot next his printing-office on the main street. The building went up under the careful supervision of the committee, the whole town looking on, and the Expressman in particular spending leisure time, of which he had a large and unused quantity, in seeing that everything was according to specifications. And when it was finally completed, one night, Red Hill collectively, every man, woman and child, went into it and proudly realized it belonged to the whole town and the country. That was a great evening in its history, and its climax, every one agreed, came when, after a great talk by Howard explaining the plan and purpose of it all, the Washburn College graduate farmer, in a neat speech, presented Howard and his wife with a beautiful framed photograph of the building, and a testimonial signed by nearly everybody as a token of their appreciation of what they had done. For the first time in his life Howard could not command his feelings. He broke down and received the picture in silence, tears on his face as he stood there by the side of his wife.

One other significant event must be recorded of general and peculiar interest to all Red Hill, that centered in the building, and that was the night, one year later, when Jake Seymour proudly, and with an excitement that threatened to set the booth and all its contents on fire, put on in the Assembly Hall the children's play written by Inez and photographed by Andrew Morris.

The play itself was called "The Other Child," and Inez, remembering the Agent's literary ambitions, had asked him to write the verses that served as a prelude. The theme was National Prohibition, and it was wonderfully worked out, with the photographs by Morris, who sat by the side of Inez that night, and all Red Hill knew that Inez was going to marry him some time that winter, and wondered that such a girl as Inez could take up with such a plain-faced man. But, as Inez said to Howard and Agnes during her visit, the Lennoxes also coming on to see Inez's triumph, "Mr. Chase, I love Andrew because he first taught me, next to you, the real value of things; and I am happy with him. Yes, really so."

There was an immense crowd in the hall the night Inez's film was on and Howard, Agnes, Rose, Roy, Kate, Inez, her father, Andrew (as they had begun to call him), Deacon Burton, Mrs. Burton, Deacon Allen, the Agent and the Expressman were all together in one section, intensely interested in Inez's first photo-film play. When Jake Seymour put his hand out of the little opening of the booth and came over to shake Inez's hand and congratulated her, the whole audience thronged about her and Howard knew that Inez had conquered in the battle of life as he had prayed she might.

"ARE you going to come out of that trance? Rose and I were later than we expected. I just peeped in here to see how the sermon was coming on and saw you were a thousand miles away—"

Howard looked up and stared at her in perfect bewilderment.

Then he said slowly, "What day is it?"

"Saturday, you foolish boy."

"I mean, what day of the year?"

"Why, it is December 9."

"Year what?"

Agnes looked at him in some alarm.

"Nineteen-sixteen. What is the matter?"

"I dreamed it was two or three years more. Mrs. Chase"—he drew her down into his lap—"I have had the most wonderful vision of the spiritual rebirth of Red Hill. Listen to me. Wait! Ask Rose to come in. I must tell it before I forget it."

Rose came in, and Howard told them. They laughed and cried together. But before he was through he had made up his mind, and when he walked into his pulpit the next morning he told the people his dream.

It made a profound impression. At the close of that day, after all the services at the church, and after all the people had gone, Howard and his wife came out and walked across the yard to the parsonage. On the little porch they turned around. Red Hill was there, its lights twinkling, the bluff

If There Were No Railroads

This $\frac{3}{4}$ Ton Reo Could Do 80 Per Cent of the Carrying

AS A MATTER OF FACT, it does just that now in certain frontier regions where, as yet, no railroads exist.

A REO DISTRIBUTOR in a Nevada mining section, tells us that, since motor trucks have proven equal to all the work, there probably never will be any railroads built there.

THE TRUCKS DO IT quicker—with less handling and delays—and more economically.

HEAVY MACHINERY is carried on mammoth motor trucks and trailers, while all supplies are taken to, and refined products from, the mines to the nearest city in the speedier, more versatile Reos.

ALSO, $\frac{3}{4}$ -TON REO CHASSES fitted with omnibus bodies, run on regular schedules and furnish the finest possible passenger service.

SO YOU SEE WE COULD, if we had to, get along without railroads.

ANOTHER EXAMPLE: Reo dealers have been driving Automobiles and Motor Trucks overland all this winter rather than wait for the crippled, congested railroads.

1,000-MILE TRIPS are no longer considered exceptional, while no dealer thinks of having his automobiles suffer the loading, shunting and unloading from railroad cars, when by driving on their own wheels, days can be saved and their motor cars and trucks arrive at destination in better condition.

DO YOU KNOW that freight travels at an average of only about a mile an hour, even in normal times? That is on "long hauls." On short hauls the rate is even slower.

A SHIPMENT OF TRUCKS going 500 miles will not reach a dealer in less than two weeks—frequently a month.

THESE SAME REOS will go overland in two days—easily.

WHY ALL SHORT HAULS—say under 100 miles—will soon be done entirely by express lines of light, speedy trucks. $\frac{3}{4}$ -Ton Reos have proven ideal in this service.

PASSENGER LINES are now in operation in hundreds of places, linking up towns and cities—yes and villages—between which, formerly there was only a once-a-day train service.

SHIP A TON of goods from your station to another 100 miles away. If it is on the same line it may arrive in two or three days. Unlikely—but it may. If on another road—two weeks, and after at least four handlings.

BY THE REO ROUTE it will arrive the same day—no shortages—only two handlings—and every minute in the care of your own man.

AND THE REO will be back home that same night too—for 200 miles a day is less than average for this Reo.

PNEUMATIC TIRES render possible speeds "as fast as the law allows." 22 miles per hour is normal rated speed.

THEY ADD WONDERFULLY to the life of the chassis and reduce to an astonishing degree the cost of upkeep.

EXPERIENCE PROVES that you won't average a puncture to every 2,000 miles—so no need to worry on that score.

OWNERS TELL US that by reasonable driving and keeping tires inflated they obtain 8,000 to 10,000 miles average on a set.

TIRES ARE BIG—34" x 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ ". That's in keeping with the Reo policy which never skimps.

"50 PER CENT OVERSIZE" in all vital parts—axles, driving shafts, gears, bearings, tires, etc.—results in that Dependability that is Reo, and guarantees you against overloading.

EXPERIENCE has taught us that in the designing and building of a truck we must protect the owner against the average driver's liability to overload.

HE DOESN'T CONSIDER whether he is loading feathers or pig iron—his, not to reason why! He just piles on all she'll hold!

REO RATINGS PROVIDE for this—Reo construction is your insurance.

UPKEEP IS LOWEST of any truck of similar capacity—figures galore prove that.

YOUR REO DEALER will show them to you—and he'll tell you what Reos are already doing in your own special line.

OUTPUT IS LIMITED—necessarily. For we also are doing our part for Uncle Sam.

DEMAND ENORMOUS—business generally speeded up and traffic heavier than ever before.

SO ONLY THOSE who order early can hope to obtain Reos.

Questions and Answers

C. H. C. sends the following interesting comment: "I was especially interested in the question that recently appeared in the Mail-Bag, asked by a reader from Jackson, Miss., as to what constitutes a call to the ministry. May I kindly give the answer of the late George Muller of Bristol, England, which I regard as very complete and Scriptural? Mr. Muller asks the question, concerning ministers or elders, 'How do such come into office?' Answer: 'By the appointment of the Holy Ghost, Acts, 20 : 28.' 'How may this appointment be made known to the individual called to the office, and to those amongst whom they may be called to labor?' Answer: (1) By the secret call of the Spirit, 1 Tim. 3 : 1; (2) confirmed by the requisite qualifications, 1 Tim. 3 : 2-7; Titus 1 : 6-9; and (3) by the Lord's blessing resting upon their labors, 1 Cor. 9 : 2.' In 1 Cor. 9 : 2, Paul condescends to the weakness of some, who were in danger of being led away by factious persons who questioned his authority. As an apostle—appointed by the express word of the Lord—he needed not such outward confirmation. But if he used his success as an argument in confirmation of his call, how much more may ordinary servants of the Lord Jesus employ such an argument, seeing that the way in which they are called for the work is such as to require some outward confirmation?"

W. D. S., Bartley, Tenn. The subject you suggest is wholly controversial. Where the Scripture says nothing on which to base such an argument, why should we question the record, instead of accepting it precisely as the evangelists have written?

Mrs. C. O. L., Madison, Minn. The subject you mention belongs to the category of controversial topics. We note with pleasure what you say regarding the movement of Union churches, and hope with you that such a truly Christian movement may soon bear great fruit.

Mrs. O. O. S., Nazareth, Pa. When were the Israelites first called Jews?

The appellation "Jew" is derived from the patriarch Judah, and was originally applied to all members of that tribe, and also to subjects of the separate kingdom of Judah, in contradistinction to the seceding ten tribes, who retained the name of Israelites. During the captivity and ever since, the term "Jew" seems to have been applied indiscriminately to the whole race. The name first occurs in 11 Kings 16 : 6.

Mrs. H. T. C., Formosa, Kan. Please explain Matt. 6 : 3.

The context shows that Christ is uttering a warning against ostentation in service and charity. The good we do is to be done for Christ's sake and to please our heavenly Father. If it is done for the sake of getting glory among men, or to gain a reputation for generosity, we lose the reward that God promises to those who make it their chief aim to please him. The right and the left hand are simply a figure, implying unostentatious kindness.

James L., New York City. You know the conditions of salvation and can judge for yourself whether you have fulfilled them. Christ said (John 10 : 27), "My sheep hear my voice and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." Try earnestly to follow Christ, to be like him, kind and patient, forgiving and sinless. Study his character and teachings as described in the Gospels, and make him your example. Pray that you may have his Spirit, and try to get your friends and companions to love him and trust him, too. You may be sure that God will keep his promise. Do not be watching continually your own feelings, but try to do all the good you can. Get out of yourself by doing something for others. There will never come a time when you can say, "I am saved and vigilance is unnecessary"; but if you honestly strive to live the Christ-like life, trusting in him, he will help you and keep you from falling.

S. T. M., Cleveland, Ohio. It is well to give heed to the prickings of conscience. If you feel in your heart that some one has been wronged, even inadvertently, by what you did, you should heed the call of conscience to make restitution. Circumstances may make this impossible in the ordinary sense; but if you cannot restore direct to those who suffered loss—if there is no way to do this that you can think of—then it is open to you to devote what you consider the full equivalent of the amount involved, be it big or little, as an offering to the Lord's work. What you did was without thought of wrong-doing, and will be forgiven if you ask it.

C. W., Everett, Mass. How old was Samuel when his mother weaned him? And how old was he when his mother dedicated him to the Lord?

Oriental mothers in those days nursed their children until they were from thirty months to three years old, and the day on which the child was weaned was kept as a festival. It cannot be stated how old Samuel was when this took place, but from the fact that he was not weaned until he was placed in the care of Eli and dedicated to the Lord, the fair assumption is that he must have been about three years old.

Inquirer, Reading, Pa. Why are the Jews persecuted and ostracized in many lands?

One cause is that they possess greater business ability than their non-Jewish competitors, and excite the envy of their fellow-citizens who regard them as injuring their business. Another reason is that they are a money-lending race, and it is often more convenient to persecute a creditor and to drive him away, than to pay him. The Jew, more than other races, is exclusive and he does not intermarry with Gentiles. Certain writers have suggested that it is probable that God is permitting the Jew to be made uncomfortable in the lands of his adoption, in order to turn his desires toward his own land, whither he must eventually return. See Jer. 43.

B. O. H., Milltown, N. B. 1. John the Baptist was ordained for his work even before his birth. The angel Gabriel proclaimed the character and office of the wonderful child, foretelling that he would be filled with the Holy Ghost from the first moment of his existence, and appear as the chosen forerunner and herald of the long expected Messiah. See Luke 1 : 15, 16, 17. The divine mission of John was the subject of prophecy many centuries before his birth, for Matthew (3 : 3) tells us that it was John who was prefigured by Isaiah as "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" (Isa. 40 : 3); while by the prophet Malachi the Spirit announces more definitely, "Behold I will send my messenger and he shall prepare the way before me." 2. John only knew that, at a definite time after his own call, his Master would show himself.

Quaker Oats

Paid for the Gown

Quaker Oats this year will save housewives, we figure, some $25,000,000. And this is how it happens:

Pound for pound Quaker Oats yields twice the nutrition of round steak. And it is ideal nutrition, with every needed element in just the right proportion. Other foods, for the same food units, cost about as follows:

Eggs Cost 10 Times as Much
Meat—on the Average—Costs 8 Times as Much Average Mixed Diet Costs 4 Times as Much

A whole week's breakfasts on Quaker Oats cost the same as one bacon-and-egg breakfast. Yet the oat, with its wealth of flavor, is Nature's most delightful grain.

Make Quaker Oats your basic food. Make it the entire breakfast. Mix it with your flour foods—for added flavor and to save the wheat. Every package of Quaker Oats saves many times its cost.

Quaker Oats

The Superlative Flakes

In Quaker Oats you get the extra flavor without any extra cost. Ask for this exquisite brand. These flakes are made from just the rich, plump, luscious oats. All the little, starved grains are discarded. A bushel of choice oats yields but ten pounds of Quaker Oats.

When such oats are sold at the Quaker Oats price, you should make sure to get them.

12c and 30c per package in the United States, except in Far West and South where high freights may prohibit.

Quaker Oats Griddle Cakes

2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1 1/2 cups flour, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon soda, dissolved in 2 tablespoons hot water, 1 teaspoon baking powder (mix in the flour), 2 1/2 cups sour milk or buttermilk, 2 eggs beaten lightly, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 or 2 tablespoons melted butter (according to the richness of the milk).

Process: Soak Quaker Oats over night in milk. In the morning mix and sift flour, soda, sugar and salt—add this to Quaker Oats mixture—add melted butter; add eggs beaten lightly—beat thoroughly and cook as griddle cakes.

Quaker Oats Muffins

3/4 cup Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1 1/2 cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 4 level teaspoons baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, 1/2 teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar.

Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter; sift in flour and baking powder; mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

Quaker Oats Sweetbits The Oat Macaroon

1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2 teaspoons baking powder
1 tablespoon butter
1 teaspoon vanilla
2 1/2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)

Cream butter and sugar. Add yolks of eggs. Add Quaker Oats, to which baking powder has been added, and add vanilla.

Beat whites of eggs stiff and add last. Drop on buttered tins with a teaspoon, but very few on each tin, as they spread. Bake in slow oven. Makes about 65 cookies.

ASK your Motor Car Dealer at what time he comes nearest to losing you as a satisfied customer and he'll tell you it is when you and he try to fix a "trade-in" price on your old car.

—You know what your car will do, and what it should be worth — but he knows what he can get for it and that is the ANSWER.

—YOU are the one that stands the loss. 40% to 50% is the first year's depreciation on your car. Take anything else you own. 10% to 15% is "charged off" the first year and is the basis for depreciation after that.

—This is most unjust especially when analysis of conditions shows that 70% of all "traded-in" cars are as good mechanically as the day they were purchased.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

IN New York, dear neighbors, the "groundhog" behaved very badly this year! He's a stubborn little neighbor, at best; and this winter he must have been in an especially gloomy mood. For back to shelter he ran, with hardly a glance at his dancing shadow and with no thought at all for us poor two-legged animals whose burrows are not half so cozy as his!

But the selfish always over-reach themselves. So while Mr. Groundhog has been snoozing away in stupid comfort, Old Father Winter has stolen a march on him (and that's not a pun, either!), to the joy of us shivering, twolegged humans. Yes, spring is on the way. It is almost here. I insist that it is, despite sarcastic friends who pull their coat collars up about their ears.
For I can feel it, and smell it. And so can the hurrying children, and my neighbor's puppy, who sits blinking happily in a patch of sunshine.

There are daffodils in the florist's windows and spring bonnets on Fifth Avenue. There's sunlight and laughter, and a tingle in the air, and the sound of merry voices. Who dares to say that spring has not come!

YOU do? And you? And you? Ah, dear skeptics, read the following adventure in neighboring—a joyous springtime adventure being carried on while you read this—and, convinced that I am right, go get your spade and your seed packet and join the war-garden brigade!

War Gardens

Being interested in conserving food, and also in out-of-door life, I am at present conducting an adventure in "war gardens." You have heard the motto: "If we can't fight we will feed a soldier." Acting on this, I have persuaded the children of our town to plant gardens, sending to our congressman for seeds and also procuring free packets from the seedmen, who give them gladly. Some of the girls, in addition to their vegetable plots, have laid out flower gardens, from which they expect to distribute flowers to the sick and shut-ins, to churches and the nearby almshouse. A committee of three visits each boy's or girl's garden every so often, in order to encourage the children and plan for an exhibit in the fall, when the young gardeners will sell their vegetables. The parents are all intensely interested, and are sending to Washington for Farmers' Bulletins and booklets on cooking and sanitation. The effect on the whole community is wonderful!

MRS. HATTIE J. HALL.

To those of us who have never known the thrill of gardening, here is a challenge, and a chance, not only for fun but for real patriotic service. For it is food, we are told, that will win this war. So every basket of potatoes raised by a boy or girl will help to keep an American soldier at the front.

AND speaking of patriotic service, here is another fine instance of it, containing a suggestion for all of us.
For there is nothing dearer to the anxious hearts of us American mothers, wives and sisters than helping the Red Cross.

Community Food Sale for the Red Cross

Our community was determined to raise money for the Red Cross, somehow! But how?
We decided to try a "food sale," and all the business men were visited. They became interested, and promised to help. Next some circulars were printed, soliciting donations of food from every one. Any kind or quantity of food was welcome, from a potato to a tub of butter. The interest aroused was wonderful.
On the day of the sale, the "store" was opened at eight o'clock, and the food began to pour in.
(The store had long been empty, and the landlord let us have it for the day. We had decorated it with American flags and Red Cross emblems.) Every one brought something.
There were tea, coffee, cocoa, condensed milk, flour, corn meal, rice, barley, oatmeal, beans, peas, potatoes, butter, meat, sugar, etc. One little girl brought in two apples! (I would have liked to fill a basket full of the good things for her.) Some of the food was bought back by the persons who brought it.

We also had home-canned fruit, vegetables and home-made bread and cake. A can of home-canned wild blackberries brought a dollar, as the man who bought it said it was worth that to him. The community charged the same prices for the food as all the local stores did. At 2 P.M. everything was sold, then we got busy again, as we were to have music and a lunch in the evening. For this the tables and chairs were all loaned, also four oil stoves which made the store nice and warm.

The lunch (which was meatless, sugarless and nearly wheatless) was a Brown Lunch, consisting of baked beans, war bread, apple-sauce seasoned with cinnamon; molasses and chocolate cakes; coffee; cocoa—each portion being five cents. We all spent a very pleasant evening, and the sale was quite a success, as it brought in over one hundred dollars. The band also gave its services free, so the community had no expenses whatever.

MRS. OLGA SHAFFER.

OUR next adventure, dear neighbors, is a quaint, jolly one, which will delight the young folks and perhaps a few of us older ones as well:

Our Parcel-Post Box

I have been so interested in the neighboring page, which I wish came every week instead of one in two, that I thought perhaps some of my small rural neighbors would like to hear about a scheme I enjoyed when a child. You know, children on a farm do not have much time for their own, especially during the school year; but how they do enjoy letters! My mother realized this, and as I was the only child in the family and lonesome for playmates, she suggested a little post-office box (a small wooden box) under the corner of our front porch, she herself writing letters to me. How eagerly I watched that box, hoping a letter had been left in it! The news of the box spread; and as several children passed our house on their way to school, and my cousin had been let into the secret, we soon found letters addressed to more than one person; and what fun it was to make little envelopes for them! Sometimes we would find grapes or something else good to eat, so it became a sort of parcel-post box, you see.
It drew the older folks together as well as us children, for our elders became greatly interested in helping us with our letters and goodies, and, in fact, often exchanged messages or gifts themselves, through our little box. Now don't you think that was a pretty way of neighboring?

S. P. B.

HERE is a heart-warming adventure of another sort:

A Wood-Chopping Bee

I have greatly enjoyed Adventures in Neighboring, and thought that perhaps my experience might interest the Neighbors. My husband and I are retired farmers; retired because of the infirmities of age, he having passed his eightieth birthday and I living on borrowed time. A year ago last July, he fell and was so severely injured that he was unable to get out for a long time. Even now he is practically confined to the house. All this time our neighbors have been very kind to us.
We had a wood lot, but as help was scarce, we failed to find any one to get in the wood for us.
Just here a kind neighbor and her husband talked the matter over, and she asked us if we would like to have a "wood bee." Then she got busy with her telephone, and the result was that men came, went into the wood, and cut down trees—cutting them into sled lengths. Others came and drew it in, and then two young men brought their buzz-saw; and the wood was sawed, split and piled, ten cords of it ready for use! There were fourteen men in all who did the work. Wasn't this a beautiful adventure in neighboring?

MRS. A. P. W.

I think we will all agree that it was!
And now, fellow Adventurers, I must step aside for a moment to make room for the Forum, which every week becomes of more definite value, due to your big-spirited generosity.

The Neighbor's Forum

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: I want to thank you and the Christian Herald Neighbors for the many fine letters I am receiving from all parts of the United States. I am answering every one, and it is "real fun." MISS J. T. B.

HOW TO PRESERVE CUT FLOWERS

Here is a bit of "flower wisdom" which may prove helpful to my Christian Herald neighbors. Before removing the beauties from the box in which they arrive, sprinkle them with fresh cold water. Then make some good strong soap-suds (which take the place of roots), and place the flowers therein, taking care not to pack the stems too closely. Every morning, the flowers must be taken out of the suds, their stems clipped a wee morsel, and the flowers laid sidewise in cool water. See that every stem is well covered, let lie for a few moments, sprinkle with fresh water, shake and return to the suds, and your flowers will look as if just that moment picked. Change the suds every three days. Follow this rule carefully, and at the end of a whole month compare your flowers with those a day or two old, which have been carefully crammed into a vase of water, and mark the contrast. Even after the fifth week, some flowers will look passably well.

This is certainly worth a trial by "flower-lovers"! MR. C. H. HENDRICKSON.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD NEIGHBORS: I am living on a farm about twenty miles from town. I am new to this part of the country, coming here last November. I have become acquainted with the young people here, and I like them very well; but I am rather opposed to their way of amusement. They have many dances and some card parties, and not many of them go to church. I don't think dancing is right. How can I get my neighbors interested in church? And how can I get some other amusements started? It is very lonesome out here for one who has always lived in town as I have. The neighbors are widely scattered. I am seventeen, and all the rest of the young people are a few years older. So I am rather lonely. I like to write and receive letters, and I wonder if some of my Christian Herald friends or some lonesome girl would like to write to me? MISS B. M. T.

How many Neighbors know that if they will stand on a thick rug, or several folds of carpet, while doing their week's ironing, they will not have such a backache or such tired feet afterward? MRS. A. B. E.

Here is my war-bread recipe. May it help some of my Christian Herald Neighbors!

- 1 yeast cake
- 1 tablespoon salt
- 1 tablespoon molasses
- 1 1/2 qts. lukewarm water
- 4 heaping cups of rye-Graham flour
- 2 cups bran
- wheat flour

Let the yeast cake soak twenty minutes in 1 cup of the water; then mix as follows: water, molasses, salt, yeast, rye-Graham flour and the bran. Mix with a large wooden spoon for about 10 minutes, then knead in about two cups of wheat flour; sometimes a little more, sometimes less. Let stand overnight. In the morning, form into loaves and let rise; then bake from 1 1/2 to 2 hours. This bread is very healthy, and my friends are delighted with it.
O. S.

MRS. N. H. W.: Why not take the very worthy work of the Red Cross as a means of bringing those women together? Get your materials from the nearest distributing point, and ascertain the most desirable house in your neighborhood for an afternoon's work. Have two or three good selections during the work hours, and arrange for another meeting. Ask some indifferent one to keep a record of the work done. Incidentally the Sunday school idea can be talked over, and a Sunday school founded, to meet in the schoolhouse. Through the Sunday school, the "boy problem" can be gradually solved. H. S. F.

I have been reading "Adventures in Neighboring," and think one cannot speak too highly of this Department which offers us the opportunity of freely exchanging our experiences. In this manner, so many who have wished "things were different" in their community, but were at a loss how to improve matters, can do so by following the suggestions offered here from time to time.

MISS HSE. M.

MISS N. E. BARNARD: Your article, "The Want to Know Club," in the Christian Herald of February 27 was very interesting to me. I am a new president of a Sunday school class of twenty-four young ladies in a small town.
Once a month we have a social evening at different homes. I am trying to introduce educational amusements, and think your idea is best for my use. I would be very thankful if you could help me by sending, at my expense, a few of your programs and readings, telling me where you found your facts and history. A NEIGHBOR.

Today's meeting, fellow adventurers, has been part grave, part gay: like life itself. But hasn't it been friendly and altogether delightful! I have enjoyed every minute of it.

I am sending this to print, a whole week before the date set for the close of our Club-Plans Contest; so I cannot report on that until our next meeting, two weeks hence.

Keeping Time With the Program

ALMOST two years ago the Baptists of the Northern Convention started in on their five-year program to secure:

A million additions to the churches by baptism.

A missionary force of 5,000 men and women at home and abroad.

Two million dollars for the ministers and missionaries abroad.

Student pastors in 25 universities.

One thousand Baptist students in theological seminaries. Fifteen thousand in colleges and universities. Six millions for additional educational endowment and equipment.

An annual income of $6,000,000 for missions and benevolence.

At the end of the first year the church had already attained more than one-fifth of the goals in most directions. Now, in the Challenge Legion, an opportunity is being offered to the Baptist young people for a greater share in the five-year program, with a special emphasis placed on the recruiting of leadership for the church of tomorrow. Organizations of the Baptist Young People's Union are asked to pledge the following action: They are asked to enroll in the Challenge Legion and to conduct within at least four weeks after enrollment a meeting for the study of the five-year program. Then they are asked to learn the share of their own church in the program and the local progress toward accomplishment. Then they are to organize according to plans which will be furnished by the Commission on Young People's Work of the Northern Baptist Convention and they are to report progress on April 1 of each year. The Challenge Legion societies are asked to plan for the last week of March a special effort in evangelistic work, making it "Win-My-Friend Week." A special effort is to be made to secure the entire membership as proportionate givers. So far as possible every member is to be enrolled in a regular Bible study course and in a missionary study course and the claims of higher education are to be presented to the entire membership.

The principles of Christian social service are to be studied and each society is to seek an opportunity to engage a group in some definite form of helpfulness. Finally the members of the society are to pledge themselves to pray singly and together for the goals of the five-year program. No B. Y. P. U. chapter can afford to miss the spiritual blessing which will come with active membership in the Challenge Legion.

Full information can be secured by addressing William E. Chalmers, D. D., Educational Dept., American Baptist Publication Society, 1703 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Music at the Bowery Mission

THE Workers in the Bowery Mission have for years felt that there is as much inspiration in high class music as there is in a good sermon. Therefore during the months from October to June, they hold weekly concerts which are made possible through the exceeding courtesy of many of the best artists in New York City—such as Hans Kronold, Dr. William Karl, Bruno Huhn, Madame Charlotte Lund and Kathryn Platt Gunn. It would do your heart good to see how the music lifts these homeless, friendless, jobless and hungry men out of themselves, and you would be quite astonished at their wonderful appreciation—not only of simple ballads, but of numbers that partake of a "classical" nature.

One Tuesday evening this winter, a member of the Christian Herald Family was instrumental in arranging a concert for the Mission men. She was amazed at the wonderful and generous appreciation. They not only clapped their hands, but cheered and kept continually calling for more. Every number received an encore. Among the artists who made this concert possible were Margaret Graham, soprano; Edith Maltwyn, contralto; Marion Leland, dramatist; Gladys Bowen and Mary Ackerman, pianists; John Charles Link, violinist; and last but not least, Professor Earl H. Leavitt, organist.

Mitchell

Sixes

The Supreme $1250 Value

SEE how this new Mitchell solves the problem of a superfine car at $1250. That's what tens of thousands want now. And Mitchell efficiency offers you a value that is unapproached.

120-inch Wheelbase

The car is big and roomy—wheelbase, 120 inches. The motor is a 40-horsepower Six—the Six in its highest development.

It is built to the Mitchell standards, with the Mitchell over-strength.

It has the Mitchell extra features, like a power tire pump, reversible headlights, shock-absorbing springs, dashboard engine primer, etc.

It has the Mitchell luxury and beauty, never matched in a like-class car.

A Wanted Type

This is the popular price for a fine car in these days of moderation. But people want room and power. They want a fine car's sturdy endurance. They want a fine car's beauty and equipment. And they want a Six in these days—not a Four.

See how our engineers, by saving wastes and cutting profits, have generously met these ideas. This Mitchell Light Six is unique.

How We Did It

We build the complete car—chassis and body—in a model efficiency plant. In an expert-built factory, designed and equipped to produce a fine car economically.

Years have been spent here to eliminate waste, to minimize labor cost, and to save the profits paid to body and parts-makers. The sum of those savings is what gives you the marvelous value in this $1250 car. In an ordinary factory such a car at this price is impossible.

The Mitchell Light Six comes in five body styles. The Mitchell line has 19 new-style bodies. You will be amazed at the new ideas which this line now embodies. Write for our catalog.

GERM PROOF

And It Was Easter

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WITH bent head the Tramp plodded along the road. It was a particularly muddy road, for spring was on the land and the frost was creeping oozy out of the ground. The Tramp's feet sloshed up and down as he shuffled along, and his frown was a very dark one.

"What a world!" he growled. The spring was on the land. A bird sang lustily from a wayside tree, and the grass along the sides of the muddy road was young and tenderly green. The sky was blue and cloudless, and there were shy violets in the shadiest nooks. But the Tramp, his head bent forward, saw only the muddy road that stretched in front of him like a slippery brown ribbon. "What a world!" he muttered again.

Far off came the sound of church bells—a clear silvery chime that rang across the quiet country.

"Must be Sunday!" observed the Tramp. "Not 'at I care!" he added.

The road dipped down into a little valley, tree-shaded, and turned an abrupt corner. The Tramp followed it unambitiously. At the abrupt turning he paused for a moment, then shrugged his shoulders and went on. For around the corner, less than two miles away, lay a town.

The Tramp did not like towns, particularly on Sunday. On Sunday the family feeling of them made him bitter. But the town just ahead was such a dreamy, peaceful little spot that it drew him forward quite resistlessly. The church spire, rising in white silhouette against the blue of the sky, seemed somehow to beckon him on; the little brightly painted houses held a certain calm lure.

"I s'pose," he grumbled, "'at I kin walk through!"

HERE is always a beginning to every town—a place where a road stops being a lonely road and becomes a friendly little thoroughfare, dipping in, in a neighborly way, at every possible gate. The road began to be a part of the town at a place where a small cottage stood in a tiny clearing, a small cottage that, in the summertime, would have been vine-wreathed and fragrant with the scent of many flowers. It was a small cottage that looked like a home.

The Tramp, standing in the middle of the road, kicked angrily at the mud with one shabbily grimy shoe. He himself scarcely knew that the sight of the little cottage raised vague longings in his soul and an even vaguer hurt in his heart. A dull resentment clutched at him and made him turn suddenly away from the small cottage. It was as he turned that he heard a sharp rap on the window glass. He wheeled in the mud, more from instinct than desire.

There was a face in the casement window—a little old face framed in thick waves of white hair—an animated little face that caught the gleam of the springtime in two china-blue eyes.

"It can't be me she's wantin'," reasoned the Tramp. He looked behind him to see if the knock had been to summon some one else.

The window of the small house swung out with a sudden joyous abruptness. A flute-like little voice spoke.

"Man," called the voice, "come here!"

The Tramp answered, but his tone was surly.

"What fer?" he questioned.

"I want," said the little voice, "to see you closer!"

"Why," questioned the Tramp quite rudely; "why don't you come out here, then?"

THE flute-like voice grew suddenly as old as the white hair that framed the face in the window.

"I can't walk," said the voice sorrowfully.

The Tramp cleared the space between the road and the window. But he did not hurry.

"What's th' idear?" he questioned as he strode across the new grass.

The little old face in the window was smiling again.

"I was lonely," said the voice. "There wasn't no one in th' house. Every one in th' village, I reckon, has gone t' church. I've had no one t' talk to all mornin'!"

"Ain't yer scared"—the Tramp's voice was strangely eager—"ain't yer scared ter tell me that yer alone? I might rob yer!"

The little old lady laughed delightedly. Her cheeks glowed with a faint pink and her small hands were clasped together in a glee that was almost childish.

"Ain't you funny!" laughed the little old lady.

"But," said the Tramp grimly, "I'm a bum—that's what I am!"

The little old lady regarded him with mirthful eyes.

"I had a boy your age once," she told him. "He's married, now, 'n' gone out West. Heuster like trampin' in his old clo's same as you do. I know! Won't yer come in?"

The Tramp answered her laughter with a shamefaced grin. But he brushed his feet on the door mat before he stepped into the cottage.

THE room that met his gaze was spotlessly clean and the little old lady was even smaller than he had thought her. Two crutches leaned against her pillowed wheel chair.

"It's good," she told him, "ter have company. I like company. You kin talk ter me. . . . Sit down."

The Tramp sat clumsily down in a cosy chair and twiddled his hat in his hands. "I ain't much on talkin'," he volunteered at last.

"Then"—the little old lady reached down into the capacious pocket of her silk frock—"then you can read to me." And she drew a little black-bound volume from the pocket.

"Why!" The Tramp was plainly mystified. "It's—a Bible."

Quite apparently the little old lady did not hear him.

"You can read the story for this day," she went on blandly; "the wonderful story!" and her little old hand held the book toward him.

The Tramp took the book in one grimy fist. There was nothing else to do.

"What?" he questioned blankly, "is th' story for today? What is terday?"

"Why"—the little old lady leaned forward and the pink of her cheeks deepened—"why, it's Easter! That's what it is!"

Easter! The Tramp, the black-bound book in his hand, thought back to other Easters when there had been a real home, and a church all hily-decked, and a well-known Easter story. Quite suddenly he choked.

"Begin," said the little old lady, and her china-blue eyes looked out of the window toward the town that lay dreaming in the spring sunlight, "begin at the place where Mary Magdalen an' th' other Mary come to the sepulcher—"

THE Tramp bent his head quite low over the book and fumbled awkwardly with the thin, gilt-edged pages. The little old lady still stared across the town. At last she spoke.

"Can't you find your place?" she questioned.

Very suddenly the Tramp was at her side.

"You're th' first lady," he said quite without prefix, and brokenly, "who's been decent ter me fer—years. Since I went ter th' bad! I'm a no-good, I am!"

"King Alcohol Dethroned"

"King Alcohol Dethroned"

By
DR. FERDINAND C. IGLEHART

DR. IGLEHART'S book tells the whole story of the nation's revolt against Drink, from the beginning up to the present time. It is a masterly presentation, so complete in every detail that it is equivalent to a whole library on the subject. He has enlisted the aid of the men who are foremost today in all the sciences, and in every leading line of business, in setting forth the successive steps through which our nation is becoming emancipated from strong drink. There is hardly an American of prominence in any line of activity, hardly a name that carries weight in legislation or on the public platform, nor yet a single writer of ability in dealing with the subject, who has not made personal contributions to this wonderful book.

Here is what Ex-President Theodore Roosevelt and William Jennings Bryan have to say about "King Alcohol Dethroned":

From Theodore Roosevelt

My dear Dr. Iglehart:

I thank you for the copy of "King Alcohol Dethroned" and appreciate your sending it to me. I wish to congratulate you on what has happened in Congress and the success that is crowning your long fight against alcoholism. The American saloon has been one of the most mischievous elements in American social, political and industrial life. No man has warred more valiantly against it than you have, and I am glad that it has been my privilege to stand with you in the contest.

Faithfully yours,
Theodore Roosevelt.

From William Jennings Bryan

My dear Dr. Iglehart:

I write to thank you for the great service you have rendered the cause of temperance and prohibition in giving to the public the results of your experience and observation in your book entitled "King Alcohol Dethroned." It comes out just at the right time to aid in securing the ratification of the amendment recently submitted. It deserves, and doubtless will have, a large sale. And what joy you must feel in the certainty of an early victory for the reform for which you have toiled so long and so faithfully. You have been a pioneer in the greatest moral movement of this generation, and, having endured the pioneer's sacrifices, no one will begrudge you the pioneer's reward. I congratulate you upon having lived to join in the shouts of triumph and to receive the credit due you for foresight and courage. I am,

Very truly yours,
W. J. Bryan.

We will send a copy of "King Alcohol Dethroned," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.40

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BIBLE HOUSE NEW YORK, N. Y.

I drink, and I can't hol' a job! I ain't out trampin' fer fun, like yer son uster. I'm trampin' 'cause there's nothing else ter do. I didn't know where this road would lead me—I didn't care! I didn't know what day it was—an' I didn't care about that, either! I'm a no-good. I can't fin' my place!"

The little old lady leaned forward until her hand touched the Tramp's ragged sleeve.

"But if you knew," she asked quietly, "that somebody cared—that somebody wanted ter help you?"

The eyes of the Tramp looked very frankly into the eyes of the little old lady.

"This is th' first time in years," he told her, "that I've even wanted ter try!"

It was a long moment before the little old lady spoke.

"Before my son grew up," she said at last, "before he got married an' went out West ter live, if ever he was troubled, or unhappy, he'd come ter my chair an' kneel down, an' we'd pray together—"

The eyes of the Tramp were still looking deep into the eyes of the little old lady. And as the little old lady gazed back she saw a light growing in them—a light that was like the resurrection of a man's hope and faith—like the re-birth of a man's soul.

Far off, in the heart of the little town, the church bells chimed again. The service was over. With a dry sob the Tramp knelt beside the old lady's chair.

WHEN a neighbor woman, breathless, came up the walk toward the cottage they were sitting together talking confidently, the Tramp and the little old lady.

"I stopped in to get you a bite of dinner," said the neighbor woman as she bustled through the door, "and to tell you about the Easter sermon. My land!" she exclaimed, catching sight of the Tramp, and cying his ragged garments with disfavor. "Who's this?"

"It's right nice of you to drop in," answered the little old lady, and one could see the shadow of a dimple in her cheek as she smiled. "And this" (her words were very soft!) "this is just a boy—come home."

How Seven Girls Fought "H. C. of L."

THE "High Cost of Living" has been met in battle and vanquished by the young women of the senior class of the Normal and Collegiate Institute, Asheville, N. C., maintained by the Woman's Board of Home Missions of the Northern Presbyterian Church, New York. Twenty-one cents is the total cost of food per day per person in each of the two dainty and attractive home cottages on the grounds of the institution, where families of seven live in plenty and have every comfort of the home. This amount covers every item of expense save heat and light. The sum of $44.10 is given each of the house mothers at the first of every month, and around the library table the members of the household hold an evening conference as to its spending, and decide what foods shall be bought and used during the month.

The honor guests at luncheon recently were Col. Fred A. Olds, director of the Hall of History, Raleigh, N. C., Mrs. N. Buckner, General Secretary, Carolina Baraca-Philathea Association, Prof. J. Edward Allen, Superintendent of City schools, Warrenton, N. C., and N. Buckner, editor of Asheville Energy. It was a delightful meal, served in the hospitable home manner. The menu was eggs in cheese omelet, bread as good as can be made anywhere, butter made from the milk of the home cow, cocoa and cream of the highest quality, with dessert of gelatine and whipped cream. The total cost of this meal for the nine persons was 93³/₅ cents, or an average of ten and three-tenths cents each. This is a slight increase over the regular cost per meal per person. Cost of the luncheon was: cheese soufflé 30¹/₅; bread 12c.; butter 8c.; cocoa 21c.; gelatine and cream 24²/₅c. Deducting cost of the dessert from the total cost of the entire meal leaves 71²/₅ cents, or an average of 7⁴/₅ cents per person. Dinner in the other cottage home was composed entirely of vegetables, viz.: creamed carrots 8c.; baked potatoes 9c.; butter 9c.; bread 10c.; baked apples 13c.; total cost 49c. for nine persons, an individual average of 5¹/₅ cents.

Home making and home economics are part of the regular curriculum for the senior class of the institution, whose members occupy the two cottages forty-five days, in the various capacities of homemaker, housekeeper, assistant housekeeper, cook, assistant cook and milkmaid.

The happy family in cottage number one consists of Misses Alice Carroll, Nashville, Tenn., house mother; Jessie Davis, West Asheville, homemaker; Louise Ramseur, Shelby, homekeeper; Maria Fletcher, Sandhill, assistant homemaker; Lillian Williams, Spartanburg, S. C., cook; Irene Osborne, Fletcher, assistant cook; and Ruth Pharr, Union, S. C., milkmaid. In cottage number two, Mrs. Lula R. Lancaster, Pasadena, Cal., house mother; Mary Orpin, Asheville, N. C., housekeeper; Effie Sample, Charlotte, N. C., assistant housekeeper; Addie Huggins, Moore, N. C., homemaker; Stella Lawing, Kittyton, Tenn., cook; Irma Wade, Laurens, S. C., assistant cook, and Kate Alexander, Huntersville, N. C., milkmaid.

One day's record of the battle against the H. C. of L. shows: breakfast 28c.; lunch 42¹/₆c.; dinner 54¹/₃c.; total $1.24²/₃. Could Mr. Hoover ask a better record for seven folks?

The three hundred girls in the institution, of which Dr. John H. Calfee is President, are Appalachians, every one of them, coming from the mountains. As they pass out from the institution they go to become real housekeepers and homemakers.

Some Food Administration Recipes

CRYSTALLIZED FRUITS. Use your own preserves. Peach, pear, apple, quince or watermelon rind will do. Drain from the fruit all syrup possible. Cut any size desired, sprinkle with sugar, and dry in the warmer or a very slow oven. It may be necessary to sprinkle the fruit again with sugar during the drying. When dry enough not to be at all sticky, sprinkle with sugar and pack in layers with wax paper between. This fruit may be used for dipping in bitter chocolate for bitter-sweets.

Fruit Paste. Put through the meat-chopper enough cherry, peach, or quince preserves to make a half-pint with the juice. Heat fruit and add two tablespoons of gelatine, previously softened in a very little cold water. Stir well, and continue stirring until it begins to cool and thicken; then pour into oiled dish to make a layer one inch thick. Let dry slowly, sprinkle with sugar, and place in box with waxed paper between the layers. A mixture of dried apricots and dates may be used for this paste. Wash apricots and soak overnight in enough water to cover. Pour off water, bring it to a boil, pour over apricots, and let stand until cool. Put apricots and dates through meat-chopper, and proceed with the proportions as given.

Tamale Pie. Two cups cornmeal, 2¹/₂ teaspoons salt, 6 cups boiling water, 1 onion, 1 tablespoon fat, 1 pound Hamburg steak, 2 cups tomatoes, ¹/₂ teaspoon cayenne pepper or 1 small chopped sweet pepper.

Make a mush by stirring the cornmeal and 1¹/₂ teaspoons salt into boiling water. Cook in a double boiler or over water for forty-five minutes. Brown the onion in fat, add the Hamburg steak, and stir until the red color disappears. Add the tomato, pepper, and 1 teaspoon salt. Grease a baking-dish, put in a layer of cornmeal mush, add the seasoned meat, and cover with mush. Bake thirty minutes.

Shepherd's Pie. Two cups cooked meat, 1 cup stock, 1 tablespoon fat, 1 tablespoon flour, ¹/₄ teaspoon salt, pepper, 2 cups mashed potatoes.

Put diced meat into a baking dish. Add brown sauce made of fat, flour, seasonings and stock. Cover top with mashed potatoes, brush with fat and brown in oven.

Here's the Way

To keep track of your expenses and those of your household, and to make such a record work for your benefit.

The Potter, King & Palmer household and personal financial record will show you what you spend, how you spend it and what you got for it.

More than that, it will show you at a glance where you can make adjustments in your expenses to balance your personal outgo.

For this record starts where other records leave off. Anyone can set down the expenses of each day, total them at the end of each week and month and so know how much and where the income has gone.

But knowing what money is spent for produces no results unless this knowledge can be used as a guide to future expenditures.

The Potter, King & Palmer record makes it impossible to overlook the relation of various expenses, because correlated and similar expenses are listed beside each other.

That's what everyone wants to keep a record for, so that the mistakes of yesterday may be made the profits of today.

The Potter, King & Palmer Record is not complicated.

Three minutes daily will keep it complete and any child who can read and write can do it.

It is not a matter of bookkeeping at all but just one of simply setting down the expense of your household or your own personal items in the column listed for them.

To readers of the Christian Herald we are offering this record at a special price of $2. This record sells for $3 and the offer does not mean a cut in price. Our $2 special offer is good only for readers of this issue of the Christian Herald.

Take advantage of it by clipping out the coupon at once. We will send you the record for your examination. If you like it, send us $2. If not, return the record within five days.

How to Avoid Rheumatism

By DR. W. H. VAIL

THERE exists as great a variety in the forms of rheumatism as there are opinions respecting what constitutes the essential characteristics of beauty. When an individual suffers from gout he is afflicted with a specific ailment, but when he has rheumatism he may have any one of a dozen different forms of disease, all classified under the head of rheumatism. To understand how indefinite the name rheumatism is, take this definition of rheumatism, as found in one of our best lexicons: "Rheumatism is a variable shifting inflammation or neuralgia or malady with aching pains, affecting sometimes the joints and sometimes other structures."

WHILE we would not think of calling rheumatism a children's disease, yet the great majority of cases of this malady occur between the ages of five and twenty-five years; that is, the first attack, for rheumatism, having gained an entrance into the system, loves to renew the acquaintance at intervals upon the least provocation. In fact, some of the best medical authorities tend to the belief that what we popularly call "growing pains" in children is a form of rheumatism, and were it treated as such, very often subsequent and more formidable attacks of this obstinate ailment might be prevented.

Again, rheumatism is a disease which is not hereditary, in the strict sense of the term, yet the tendency to it in succeeding generations is as strong, or even stronger, than in the case of most diseases which were formerly considered inherited.

Without exhausting the list of the varieties of rheumatism, we would consider here four general classes. First, acute inflammatory rheumatism, or rheumatic fever; second, sub-acute rheumatism; third, chronic rheumatism; and lastly, muscular rheumatism. Acute rheumatism is the form that is accompanied with fever, painful and swollen joints, is sudden in its onset, and well deserves the adjective acute. This is the variety which shows itself early in life, is constitutional in its nature, including, perhaps, the "growing pains," and in certain epidemics is infectious, which means that the microbe is in the air, or is communicated in some way from person to person with amazing rapidity. The relationship between the acute and sub-acute forms of this disease is difficult to determine. Some consider sub-acute rheumatism merely as repeated attacks of the acute variety. Certainly we have the same symptoms, though as a rule in the sub-acute cases they are milder in form, but more stubborn in character. Like all diseases, rheumatism possesses its individual micro-organism, or bacillus, which is always present where the disease exists, and the name of which is diplococcus rheumaticus, and which is claimed to be the specific cause of acute rheumatism.

CHRONIC rheumatism is a term applied rather loosely to a great variety of chronic joint affections, which sometimes are the result of repeated attacks of acute rheumatism, sometimes of gouty origin, or the result of repeated exposures to wet and cold, where proper care has not been exercised.

Muscular rheumatism includes painful affections of certain groups of muscles or integuments, attributable to inflammation of their fibrous or tendinous attachments. Like chronic rheumatism, this variety has for its cause, as a rule, exposure to cold and wet, often after violent exercise and profuse perspiration, when the clothes are not changed. The chief varieties of muscular rheumatism are lumbago, in which the muscles of the lower part of the back are affected; intercostal rheumatism, affecting the muscles between the ribs; and torticollis, or stiff neck, affecting the muscles of one side of the neck. Here it is that we approach the dividing line between rheumatism and nervous diseases of the same regions, such as lumbago and sciatica.

Naturally when we approach the question of avoiding attacks of rheumatism, we would expect to face a very complex problem, but when we bring the whole subject down to the rules which should govern our daily lives, we shall find the situation not as complicated as was feared. We are aware of the fact that the medical profession is changing its views as to the acid condition of the blood acting as the cause of the attack, especially in the acute form of the disease; but that does not do away with the fact that in all cases of acute rheumatism the blood and tissues involved are always loaded with acids, and immediately resort is made to alkalies and baths for the relief of the system, and the cure of the patient. While the bacillus may be necessary for the occurrence of the attack, yet it is a question whether the disease could or would occur when the blood was not thus loaded with acids. Therefore, in order to prevent attacks of acute rheumatism, do not allow the system to become loaded with acid accumulations; and the same rule holds good in relation to the other varieties of this disease. The same careless method of living which leads to auto-intoxication and indigestion will naturally tend to attacks of rheumatism of one form or another. The thing to do is to see to it that the secretions and excretions of the body are kept in active service, through the use of proper articles of diet, the thorough mastication of the food, and the ample supply of liquids, such as water, milk and the mild fruit acids, avoiding such articles as tomatoes, strawberries, and especially grapefruit, as well as any extremely sour fruits. At the same time remember that mild lemonade, oranges and other mild fruit acids become alkaline through the processes of digestion and thus tend to prevent the acid condition of the system which might lead to the occurrence of rheumatism.

in dim outline, a clear winter sky star-set over all, the little church across the yard white in the darkness, the faint flutter of some prairie creature out on the section road, and Howard, Agnes by his side, looked up, and after a moment he said:

"Why may not my dream come true for Red Hill?"

"I believe it will. Let us work and pray to make it real," his wife replied.

They stood there silently a moment, and then went into the parsonage.

"Isn't it rather cold out there to be courting?"

"We were not courting," said Howard gravely.

"What were you doing?"

"Dreaming," he answered. And Agnes added: "Some dreams come true. Maybe ours will."

"Howard Chase" in Book Form

Trades for Disabled Soldiers

charge of the cripples and wounded as they come home from France and lie in the hospitals, and teach them such trades and occupations as they may be able to carry on when they have sufficiently recovered to go out into life. There are at present something like 13,000,000 wounded and crippled soldiers in Europe, and among these are more than 3,000,000 who have lost one limb or another.

If 100,000 disabled men are sent back to the United States during the first year of our fighting, at least 20,000 of them would require vocational re-education to overcome the handicaps incurred in the service. Wounded soldiers will be so trained that they can make a livelihood. Four teachers will be needed for each 100 men. All of the teachers will have to be especially trained, and the government is preparing to start this work under the direction of the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

THE work of training must be begun just as soon as possible in order to prevent the men from becoming discouraged and drifting into the ranks of dependents. Re-education puts spirit and life into them, and they begin to improve as soon as the training begins. French figures show that 80 per cent. of the men who have been trained in the hospitals have become efficient laborers, whereas only 5 per cent. of those who have taken up such training upon leaving have been of any value.

I have before me some photographs of crippled soldiers who have been rehabilitated and gone back to work. One man who has lost an arm is working at a carpenter's bench; he is using a drawing knife, which could only be done by means of his artificial arm. Another picture is that of a blacksmith at work at an anvil. The man has four artificial limbs. A pair of pincers take the place of the fingers and thumb of one hand and the hammer fits into a hole in the other wooden arm. A third picture shows a class of cripples learning the tailoring trade. Three or four one-legged men sit on the table working away at their sewing.

THE government is taking a census of the trades where such men can be used, and it is looking into the requirements of all branches of industry. Many owners of factories have said they are willing to take in these wounded men, and not a few of the trades in certain sections have agreed to employ skilled cripples, if they should be furnished. This is so of the leather trade of New York. The variety of work seems to be practically unlimited. In the wheat fields of western Canada, war cripples with artificial hands and feet are running farm tractors.

It is interesting to know what they are doing in the rehabilitation of the crippled soldiers of Europe. The Germans have listed every wounded man as a military asset and they have brought this work so near perfection that they are able to use more than 80 per cent. of their wounded in the war industries back of the lines, while of the remaining 20 per cent. from 10 to 15 per cent. are able to support themselves by trades taught in the hospitals.

THERE are fifty re-educational establishments in France, most of which are connected with the hospitals. All are receiving more or less government assistance. Some of the men work in shops that are established for the purpose. Others go out into the industries and others live at home and come to work at the shops. There is one school at Lyons, named after General Joffre, which is now teaching book-keeping, shorthand and typewriting, and also paperstitching, shoemaking, woodworking and carving, as well as toymaking. The toymakers have made a profit from the start. A great deal of work of this kind is going on in Canada, where it is found that something like 80 per cent. of the men discharged from the hospitals are able to return to their vocations. Of the remainder about 10 per cent. are trained to new trades, and the remaining 10 per cent. need only a limited amount of vocational training.

The Federal Board believes that the United States should educate its men along all such lines as a business investment. It wants vocational education established all over the country, so that special training schools may be open to all. We have now something like 14,000,000 people engaged in manufacturing or mechanical work, and not one in a hundred has had special training. The board believes that such schools would not only pay their own way, but that they would greatly increase our natural wealth. We have now something like 25,000,000 people over eighteen years of age engaged in farming, mining, manufacturing and other industrial pursuits. If we can add 10 cents a day to the wages of each of these by training, the increase for the whole would be more than $2,500,000 a day. It would be $750,000,000 per year, and if we make the increase of wages 25 cents a day the profit on the whole would be a total increase in the income of our laborers of more than $6,000,000 a day, or more than $1,800,000,000 per year. It would more than pay the interest on the bonded debt we are likely to have when this war is over.

Get This Free Book on the United States Navy

THIS is a moment when every American looks with keen interest toward the American Navy. Our great gray battleships are one of our two chief bulwarks of defense. The safety of every citizen depends on the efficiency of these giant engines and the courage of the crews who man them.

Few Americans have a clear idea of how men live in the Navy—of the daily routine of the boys behind the guns.

A Free Book on the Navy

The Christian Herald offers you a glimpse behind the scenes—a free book on life in the Navy published by the government. This little book tells what a United States sailor must be physically; how he is trained; how he lives; how much he is paid; how the Navy educates him; the rewards he earns by distinguished service.

There are 20 striking illustrations of Navy life, on the battleships and on land, including a full-page picture of the monster Pennsylvania, one of the half-dozen most powerful fighting machines in the world.

This book on the Navy should be in the hands of every patriotic American. Here is an up-to-date, minute account of life in the Navy, at a time when the Navy is fighting day and night for you.

A copy of this official booklet will be mailed free to you on request. Send your name and address, enclosing a 2-cent stamp for return postage, to The Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C.

inches

Size of Cover
5 1/4 x 8 inches

THE only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.
3. A Red Star (*) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

The Christian Herald Red Letter Bible, illustrated above, Contains Full References; also a Concordance, Subject Index, and Dictionary—all under One Alphabetical Arrangement—together with Helps, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

The text is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. There are 268 pages of Helps or Concordance and 17 superb Maps. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market. We send this superb Bible, together with The Christian Herald for $4.50 one whole year, for....

Christ in America

By REV. CLYDE F. ARMITAGE

General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains

THE Cross of Christ proceeds to certain victory. His believers should no longer doubt the ability of their Saviour to win the world. He without whom not anything was made that has been made will not allow his creation to defeat his purpose in building it. The Church has long preached to the world his plan of redemption, and the world is recognizing now that he is working out his plan.

Does the faith of the Church endow her with his spirit of victory? To a person with spiritual discernment it should be clear that although old things are passing away, and all things becoming new, the Christ increases still.

To none of us do the horrors of the present appeal so poignantly as to the Lover of men; but shall he not see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied? The Christ, whom death could not kill and whom the grave could not hold, is making mighty conquests, and of his dominion there shall be no end.

THE Church is with the Master and her progress is a mighty achievement. A noted Christian leader said at the beginning of the war: "The range of our usefulness and leadership in the years after the war will be determined by our usefulness and the reality of our practical ministry in the war." Then the Church shall be a loved center of blessing after the war. For, although frequently criticized until it is said that in no wise like a mighty army moves the Church of God, a just estimate would give large credit for the work done. It is the work of the Church, bringing the spirit of the Master into society, that has given us a cleaner Army than any nation has had in previous wars; that has prompted the nation, indeed, to fight for humanity as we are now doing; that has caused her sons to enlist by tens of thousands; that induces the public to economize and cooperate in every way requested by the departments of our government. Her offerings to benevolent causes during the stress of these times have been not only maintained, but increased, and her ministry to the suffering at home and abroad has multiplied and intensified. Every week has brought appeals from official and voluntary organizations of various characters, but none of these have fallen upon deaf ears. Laymen and pastors strive alike to do their bit, do their duty, do their best.

ONE of the best signs of the time is the way men are personally turning to the Saviour. Soldiers, sailors and marines, and civilians as well. Whose heart has not rejoiced as he has read of the way the men welcome religious services, read the Bibles and Testaments that are distributed, and record their allegiance to the Master? The experience of ministers who have been privileged to work among our military forces has been a blessing, and has reheartened some at home whose recent successes have been small.

The conditions that prevail today have increased the essential democracy for which Christ pleaded. Discriminations are being lost and lines of demarcation obliterated. The various corps of the Christian Army are in closer harmony and nearer to unity than ever before. The same spirit appears in the work of the world. The selection of public servants and trustees has been lifted above party lines. That democracy for which we are fighting to make the world safe is every day a more tangible reality.

As the world learns the doctrines of the fatherhood of God, it evolves the practice of the brotherhood of man.

AMERICA'S awakening to a sense of her duty has brought her a sense of her power. In the face of the world's catastrophe she begins to do her utmost with comparatively no lowering of labor standards and with a marked rise in her social and moral plane. A spirit of stewardship has seized the nation. A country that hardly knew that her soldiers and sailors were a part of her population, pledges every institution and every effort to their present success. Our schools teach government and patriotism with new avidity. They have learned the pedagogical and personal value of expression in helpful and practical work. The fraternal orders of the country have developed their benevolence. All our institutions have responded to the needs of the times beyond the hopes of the most optimistic. The Church has not simply endorsed what the institutions and the government have done; but these are operating in the spirit of the Master as conveyed through the teachings of the Church. The response on the part of the Church is as notable as any. She may once have forgotten her ministers who became chaplains for the soldiers and sailors, but she is now alert in every part for every phase of America's welfare, both military and civil; and her efforts are major factors in the ultimate successes.

Out of the awfulness of the present carnage and demolition are already appearing the blessings that God would release. Those are bold to say that the war is necessary to the evolution of the world. Those are daring to say that God found it necessary to introduce these blessings through such a direful calamity. But it would be better to be bold or daring than to close one's eyes to the results already manifest. The thunder of the war's artillery has shaken the foundation of autocracy and lifted the rights of the people immeasurably. The world has been brought close together.

THIS gives a challenge to a world evangelism that shall carry the message of Christ's salvation to all parts of the earth, according to his Great Commission. Destruction of the liquor traffic has been hastened. The freedom born of the struggle is already manifest in its social phases, its political aspects, and its ecclesiastical relations. Out of the tragedies of the times has been revealed the world's need of Christ. His faithful followers and the whole Christian nation have been called upon to fill up that which was lacking of the affliction of Christ. Humanity is seized with a determination toward divinity and is working out the will of God.

SERVICE

I
"BUT I have so little, so little to give
That it's not worth while, in a way,"
A woman was heard to utter these words
As the war waged day by day.

II
"So little to give!" Can we bear to hear
This feeble, paltry cry,
While the ones we love fall hour by hour,
And others go forth to die?

III
Has she never thought that just one soft touch
Or the glow in a woman's eyes
Can often relieve the sickening pain,
Help still the shuddering cries?

IV
"So little to give!" Is it possible
That she hasn't even a prayer
To give to her God, in confidence
That it puts someone in his care?

V
"So little to give!" Ah, show her the way.
Dear God, that she consecrate
Thy gifts, while she joins the throng of those Who serve, though they stand and wait.

Young People's Topics for April 7

Christian Duty and the Privilege. IV.
(Bible Reading)

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics. Ps. 119: 9-16 (Consecration Meeting)

HE would be a poor lawyer who, from his admission to the bar, seldom opened a law book, and attempted to practice on what he remembered of what he learned at school. Few of us would patronize a doctor who felt it unnecessary to continue his studies even as he practiced the healing art. Yet some Christians attempt to go through life with no more knowledge of the Word than they have learned in Sunday school or in a catechism or confirmation class. What wonder that there are so many half-hearted Christians, that there is so little real spiritual life among such multitudes of church members. A dusty Bible is an almost certain sign of a shrunken faith. In the 105th verse of this same Psalm the singer cries: "Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." In the 97th verse, "O how I love thy law! It is my meditation all the day!" and in the 103d verse "How sweet are thy words unto my taste! Yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth!"

The Bible is a spring of living water; a storehouse of the heavenly manna; a messenger of the Father, and a guide for the faithful; its words have inspired our greatest poets, and the faith it reveals has been the strength of the greatest leaders Christendom has known. In it the weak become strong, the fearful gain courage, the dumb learn speech, the sinner finds salvation, and the saint a consecration that leads to perfection in Christ. A closed Bible is a tragedy. It is our duty as Christians to make the Bible an open book in our homes. It is our privilege to make its messages a part of our every-day life. His Word hid in our hearts will speak through our testimonies, will bless our meditations, and will remain in living words upon the tablets of our memory.

Understanding and Doing Christ's Will
Epworth League Topic. Eph. 5: 15-17;
John 2: 5; 7: 15-18

THE 17th verse of the 7th chapter of John, included in the reference for this topic, is the key by which the topic may be unlocked; "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."

It is impossible to understand God's will, which is Christ's will for us, unless we seek earnestly to do his will. The apostle told the Christians of Philippi to let this mind be in them which was also in Christ Jesus, and the mind which is in Jesus he outlined as one which acknowledged fully all its power, but which humbled itself even to take the form of a servant, becoming obedient even unto death, for which God also exalted him. We cannot know God's will for us until we have humbled ourselves and offered ourselves fully for service, no matter how menial, for any sacrifice, no matter what suffering it may entail. When with this mind we go to our knees in prayer we may confidently expect that from between the horns of his altar will come to our minds and hearts an understanding of his will which will enable us to go forth and to do it.

Women Helping the New Liberty Loan

REPRESENTATIVES of thirty National societies of women were present at a meeting of the Advisory Council of the National Woman's Liberty Loan Committee, held in New York March 1 and 2. Mrs. Kellogg Fairbank, chairman of the Advisory Council of the National Woman's Liberty Loan Committee, presided. Mrs. Fairbank stated that 6,000,000 women represented at the meeting had pledged themselves to extraordinary efforts in behalf of the third Liberty Loan. Church societies of all denominations, including Protestant, Catholic and Jewish women, have promised to erect Liberty Loan booths in their parish halls for the sale of Liberty Bonds. The National League for Woman's Service has given its word to maintain, in every town where it has an organization, a booth in a park or other public place, from which members will provide public speaking upon the Liberty Loan. The National Woman's Stage War Relief Society is arranging a definite plan for a Liberty Loan drive among actresses. The Woman's Farm and Garden Association, which is sending its land army of women out in units, has instructed the head of each unit to act as Liberty Bond spokesman among the farmer folk of her community. The National Federation of College Women, which is issuing patriotic propaganda through films, has pledged itself to put out a Liberty Loan film as part of its campaign, and the Woman's Auxiliary of the Bohemian National Alliance, representing 600,000 Bohemian women, has organized for the sale of bonds and divided its membership into groups for that purpose.

The Reapers

By JOHN D. WHITING, American Colony, Jerusalem
Photographed by American Colony, Jerusalem.

AFTER the lentils and similar crops of the bean family have been gathered in, the barley harvest comes next and lastly the wheat.

When harvesting the men wear a leathern apron and sometimes a large padded glove. The women have none of the protections provided for them. Sickles are of two kinds, one, the kaloosh, is small and with quite a dull edge and is employed when the crops are short and scanty. These do not cut the straw but rather help pull up the grain by the roots or break off the brittle stalks. The other, called manjal, is much larger and supplied with short slanting teeth and is used on the tall well-grown grain fields.

Reaping with these simple implements and binding the sheaves with their own straw, a considerable amount is left behind and many of the ears drop off, but once the reapers have advanced they, actuated by almost religious scruples, will not pick up that which has been dropped, even though they be severely poor themselves, for they unwittingly follow a command not given to them but to former inhabitants, the tillers and reapers of this land: "And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest; thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger." Lev. 23: 22.

In the fields then during the harvest we see gleaners at work. They are poor women and girls, villagers who have no fields of their own to harvest, or possibly the wives and daughters of the hired reapers, who often find it more profitable to glean than to work for wages in the harvest fields.

It is a common occurrence to find a kindly landowner allowing a destitute woman to "glean even among the sheaves," for usually they are prohibited from gleaning before the sheaves have been taken away, just as fell to the lot of Ruth the Moabitess when "Boaz commanded his young men, saying, Let her glean even among the sheaves, and reproach her not." Ruth 2: 15.

As the gleaners pick up here and there the stray ears of wheat or barley (the word corn in our Bible refers to wheat), they are bound into neat little bundles which the gleaner drops behind her as the reapers do the sheaves, and no one will molest or touch them. But at even all are collected and the heads beaten out with a stone or stick on the surface of some large stone or flat rock, and the winnowed grain is carried home every night, usually in the large white veil which covers the head. "So she (Ruth) gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned." Ruth 2: 17.

Our photograph shows three women and a man at work in a field of barley on the top of Mt. Scopus, which is a continuation of Olivet to the north. Here Titus, with his Roman army, encamped on these heights about Jerusalem during that awful siege when, in 70 A. D., the prophecy of our Lord concerning the Temple that "there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down," was, to the letter, fulfilled.

Mellotone

Better Than Wall-paper, Kalsomine or Water Paints

MELLOTONE, in beautiful mellow-toned greens, reds, blues, grays, tans and browns, brings charming color harmonies and rich simplicity into your home.

Mellotone is economy. For it preserves and protects walls and ceilings, now so costly to repair or replace.

Mellotone does not fade, is not easily scratched, marred or soiled, washes bright and clean, is healthfully sanitary besides outlasting wall-paper and water-mixed finishes.

Before decorating send for Mellotone Color Card and "The House Outside and Inside"—with its many suggested color harmonies. Free. The Lowe Brothers' Service Department will suggest special color schemes gratis.

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Established 1879
Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold. Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boom by Asthma sufferers. For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities. It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10¢ in stamps.

FOUR MEN OF PROVEN GOOD JUDGMENT PROMINENT IN SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK

START AT ONCE

ALL 30 pictures will be sent you at once, with the reference book of 2,000 Bible verses, called International Bible Readings, and the Answer Book. Thus you will have the complete Outfit, with nothing more to secure at any time.

The Picture Study consists simply of choosing from the reference book the verses best illustrated by the 30 Bible pictures. It is just a test of good judgment.

You have until April 22—but no later than that—to order. But you will have until May 31 to send in your sets of verses—sets postmarked as late as that final day will be accepted, even though they are delivered to us several days later!

So you have plenty of time to compete and compete well. Indeed, some participants in the Picture Study deliberately wait until all the pictures have appeared, so that they can then sit down in the evening with all 30 pictures before them, and within a short period of comparison select the most fitting verses from the reference book, and write them in the Answer Book.

Hurry to start—with the knowledge that you will have all the time you should require to give the competition your best judgment, and to submit a set of verses that may gain first award!

WE announce today the Judges of the Third Bible Picture Study, in which our readers are now participating.

Probably every name is well known to you, and these are men in whose judgment you will have the greatest confidence, for they are not only deeply versed in the Bible, but also men of proven good judgment, who will discriminate keenly as to the applicability of different verses submitted for a picture.

Why not enter the National Bible Picture Study right now—today—and submit a set of verses that will coincide with the decisions of this eminent Committee of Judges? You have just as great an opportunity to win the $1,000.00 in cash, first award, as any person anywhere, and while you are competing the gain in knowledge and understanding of the Bible will be exceedingly great. Yet this spiritual and intellectual gain will be acquired almost without your realizing it, while you are pleasantly competing in the absorbing Bible entertainment. Start today!

Profit Derived Beyond Description

Winner of Sixth Prize, $100.00
Cash, in the Second Bible Picture Study, Thanks the Lord

I THANK the Lord for "The Christian Herald," The Bible Picture Contest, and for the sixth prize. I enjoyed the First, the Second still more, and am now enjoying the National Bible Picture Study.

The profit derived is beyond description and the study does not conflict with my housework, for I can wash dishes or sew on buttons just as well, when thinking about the verses and pictures.

I read "Pearls from the Bible" through fifteen times and regretted having to stop and send in my reply book. I am thankful for my increased Bible knowledge and I thank the Christian Herald for my generous reward.

Sincerely yours,
Mrs. H. E. Staples.

Don't you think you could submit a set of verses that would prove to have been well selected? Everybody has the same opportunity everywhere—order today and know that you will surely win one prize, the prize of increased Bible knowledge!

Hurry! You have till May 31st to submit your answers, but only till April 22nd to order outfits!

Jesus Sets Men Free

International Sunday School Lesson for April 7. Mark 7:1-37

"If therefore the Son shall make you free, then are ye free indeed"

Christian Enfranchisement

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

CHRIStUS Liberator—so we can interpret the mission of the Man of Nazareth who came to set men free from sin, to deliver them from bondage, to soothe their pains and woe, to calm their frantic strife. Jesus the Great Emancipator—that is the thought we will seize upon for our study today. How marvelously his life answers to Isaiah's description of God's chosen Ambassador anointed with the divine Spirit to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the dungeons of earth, to send light to the nations! How fearlessly he went about that work of his! He ran counter to age-long prejudices, to vested interests, to a mistaken interpretation of religion itself. He never flinched. "The bravest, freest spirit ever breathed."

Jesus Sets Men Free from Traditionalism

In this chapter of tales about the liberating Christ, the first incident brings him into conflict with ceremonialism in religion. There is a certain tendency for all human activities to become stereotyped, and for organized religion especially to become enswathed in its own forms until the spirit well-nigh stifles. The great reformers, the mighty prophets, are always men who cut through the outward trappings and reveal anew the heart of God. Judaism was legalistic by nature, and the protests of Isaiah had been forgotten when Christ came. How often he brushed aside tradition with his "Ye have heard it said by them of old time . . . but I say . . ."

He comes back to the reality of which the rite is a symbol. The Pharisees still made much of the ceremonial of hand-washing, but had forgotten its symbolic meaning of clean hearts, of sanctified wills. They still recited the old prayers and psalms, but without contrite spirits and humble confession of sins. Jesus sadly but sternly quoted Isaiah's immortal rebuke of mere ritualism:

"This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me."

Then he distinguishes between the Divine will and human traditions. "Ye leave the commandment of God and hold fast the tradition of men." We shall never outgrow the ten commandments. But how we outgrow the ancient theological controversies and such practices as praying by rote and invoking others than Christ to help us!

Christian ethics has a deeper foundation than mere custom. It is based on eternal principles of right and wrong. But Christian practice is another matter. Our forms and ceremonies, our ways of working and worshiping, must be adaptable to the varying needs of men. How strange that half of Christianity should hold to a fixed form of worship in an ancient language! How singular that in the other half so many people still cling more tenaciously to their sectarian traditions than to the big vital essentials of faith and service!

Jesus shows how often ritualism actually defeats the purposes of religion. He uses an example that was familiar to his hearers. If a man pronounced the word "corban," which means "consecrated," over anything, he was free from the obligation to use it for ordinary purposes, even if he changed his mind about giving it to God! So if an ungrateful son said "corban" over his wages, he was exempt from helping to support his mother, even though he did not give the money to the Temple! Of course, originally the practice meant that an offering, once vowed, was sacred and exempt from conflicting claims.

There is the gravest kind of danger that reliance upon ordinances will replace faith and good works.

Jesus defines the things which count most in religion. They are the thoughts and desires of the heart. Religion is not primarily concerned with eating certain kinds of meat, or keeping fasts, or taking communion, or wearing certain kinds of clothing. It has to do with the inner life of the spirit. As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he.

Thus Jesus set men free from the burdens of the scribes and the Pharisees and their modern counterparts. He would banish bitter discussions of "orthodoxy," and substitute prayerful conferences of fidelity to the advancing Kingdom of God. He would put all forms and observances in their true place as auxiliaries and helpers of the people, who are not to be slaves of the letter but sons of the Spirit. "For ye received not the spirit of bondage again unto fear; but ye received the spirit of sonship, whereby we cry Abba, Father."

Jesus Sets Men Free from Disabilities of Race and Sex

When Jesus concluded this controversy with formalism, he went apart to the region of Tyre for a quiet season. Here a poor Syrophenician woman sought him out with such faith as he had not seen among the strict Jews who had been antagonized by his teachings. How little worthy were his countrymen to have precedence and to glorify themselves as God's only children. To the woman he said, "Don't you know that we Jews consider ourselves children in God's house and you Gentiles as the dogs?" The woman was meek, wise, and humble in her rejoinder: "Even the household dogs pick up the children's crumbs." Faith puts the best interpretation on every emergency.

Jesus set her daughter free from her affliction. But more than that, he set the woman free from the disability of her race and sex. Christ speaks to all faithful souls. Some of us have been studying the ministry of Robert Moffat. We learned the incident where Moffat asked the Boer farmer to call the Kaffir servants in to the prayer circle. He responded that they might as well call in the baboons and the dogs. Then the missionary applied the story of this woman, and the old Boer for the first time realized that Christianity recognizes no human boundaries.

Jesus' supreme ministry of liberation is exerted upon sin's prisoners and upon those who have fallen into spiritual deadness, deafness and dumbness. We have in our lesson the tale of a man who could not speak distinctly or hear at all. Jesus called his attention to his ears and his tongue, and looking upward he opened new possibilities to that cramped and handicapped mind. Just as soon as we begin to discuss and apply this teaching, we find ourselves compelled to make it an analogy of the spiritual ease of so many of God's children—deaf and dumb to his grace. They have ears to hear but they hear not, they do not see, they do not say what he would have them say. Jesus touches their hearts and they feel the impact of the unseen. He still makes those who were deaf to humanity's appeals hear the call to sacrifice and love. He still makes those who were dumb in spirit abundant in prayer and praise.

"If thou knowest the gift of God," he says to those who are letting life go by undeveloped, wasted, misspent as that Samaritan woman who met him by the well-side. Thank God, today, like her, they respond and become heralds of good tidings.

Miracles in Transformed Men

Yes, there are plenty of modern miracles in transformed men and women. Here is a boy, rough and ready, sometimes at Sunday school, sometimes off on all sorts of adventures. We didn't believe he could be aroused to noble Christian idealism. Then in the army camp he became attached to a manly, whole-souled Y. M. C. A. secretary, who became his hero. Together they planned and prayed and studied the Bible. The lad writes of the great thoughts and high ideals awakened in him: "I never knew what Christ meant before. I must live for him and for his Kingdom." Here is a girl who seemed to some rather frivolous. A vision of service has dawned upon her soul. She is studying hard to have the most to give in consecration. She sings with a spiritual quality that startles her hearers. Her life is beautiful.

These young people are enfranchised Christians. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set them free from the law of sin and death. They are free from spiritual dullness, no longer blind and dumb, but seeing and giving thanks unto God. Others are waiting for the Christ to pass by, in the person of some one speaking "in His name" to touch the imprisoned spirit and set it free in Him. Christ the Liberator is commissioning us to break the bonds that remain. "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you."

How the Herald Contest Helps Individuals and Schools

FROM Mr. M. H. Bigelow, superintendent of the First Presbyterian Sunday School, Atlantic City, N. J., comes this unique plan of using the Christian Herald Bible Contest Pictures so as greatly to increase the interest of the whole school in the lessons.

Mr. Bigelow obtained from the Herald 60 pictures from the first Herald Contest and had the whole 60 pictures placed on ten slides, six Bible pictures to a slide, by Underwood & Underwood. Mr. Bigelow obtained from the Herald a number of these pictures and distributed them each Sunday to pupils in the Junior, Intermediate and Senior Departments of the school. The pupils would work during the week to discover the Scripture verse that would fit the picture, and the next Sunday the answer would be thrown on the screen.

The pupils were given credits for the following points: attendance, punctuality, getting the right verse, learning the right verse of the previous Sunday.

Mr. Bigelow says: "You would have been surprised to have seen the interest the pupils took in the study and also the teachers and many outside the classes. They purchased books and made note books, and I felt that I had found something worth while. When this third contest started I again took up the matter to see if we could not take up the study of these pictures as a school, purchase for example a subscription for each class, and then furnish each pupil with an outfit."

Some fine testimony as to the great personal value of this Bible text searching came from some who were successful in winning prizes in the last Herald Contest.

A lady from Virginia wrote: "This (third Contest) is especially interesting to me because it is connected with the Sunday school lessons, as I have been a constant Sunday School worker and student for thirty years."

A Kansas correspondent said: "I found it to be a very fascinating way to study the Bible message. I also soon discovered that this unique way of searching the Holy Scriptures for its priceless gems proved to be a wonderful source of inspiration to me."

From Florida: "Even if I had not received a prize, the pleasure and gain obtained in searching for verses to fit the pictures would have rewarded me. I am, of course, participating in your third Bible Picture Study, and find it as entertaining and instructive as the last one."

From California: "The profit derived is beyond description and the study does not conflict with my housework, for I can wash dishes or sew on buttons just as well when thinking about the verses and pictures. I read 'Pearls from the Bible' through fifteen times, and regretted having to stop and send in my reply book."

From Syracuse, New York: "I know more about the Word now than before your Contests were started, although I had read the Bible through twice before."

From Ohio: "I enjoyed working on the Second Contest and learned there were many things in the Bible I didn't know were there, although I read the Bible through years ago."

A Pennsylvania man writes (he won third prize): "I wrote on separate pieces of paper all verses that in my judgment fitted the pictures, and then sorted them out until what I considered the best remained. This took place sometimes quite early in the morning as my time is pretty well taken up with other things the rest of the day and night."

with Norway. The Netherlands government, held in terror by German pressure, while not refusing, nevertheless failed to sign the agreement that had been arranged. Great Britain and America announced, therefore, on March 14, that unless the agreement was sooner consummated, they would, on March 18, exercise their rights under international law and take possession of all Dutch shipping, some 1,000,000 tons, lying in their harbors. It was declared that owners would be fully compensated both for the use of their vessels and for their loss if it occurred, and that the ships still afloat would be returned when the war was over. It was also announced that Holland would receive the same food supplies and other concessions as if she had completed the convention, but that foods and other materials would be held for her at Allied ports, and that she would be at liberty to use her 1,500,000 tons of shipping now in home ports to secure these goods.

SELLING THEM OUT. A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, having called attention to the fact that a great many of the industries which have come under his control were more or less directly owned by the German Government, or persons connected therewith, and that many of these companies were making profits which would accrue to the nation's enemy, and also that there was a widespread strain of German financial influence throughout America, permeating many industries, the Senate on March 11 voted to give authority to Mr. Palmer to seize and sell all German owned or controlled property in the United States. It was said that German owned or controlled factories and other properties represented investments of considerably more than a billion dollars, and that many of them were ammunition plants and factories at present making equipment for the United States government.

THE PROFITS OF WAR. Berlin was reported on March 11 to be greatly stirred by revelations through a parliamentary subcommittee of profiteering by big firms at the expense of the government. The Daimler Motor Company was said to have advanced the cost of a motor car from £250 to £600, and to have charged for motors, of which it had a monopoly, as high as £750. The exorbitant profits made by the company were said to have been covered by falsifications, the books showing the payment of higher wages than were received by the men. The great Krupp organization, in which the Kaiser was said to hold shares valued at nearly $5,000,000, was also reported among the profiteers.

FISHERIES DISPUTE ENDED. The controversy between the United States States and Canada over the Newfoundland fisheries has been settled for the duration of the war. The joint commission representing the two governments has agreed that vessels of either nationality may use the ports of both nations at will without any special license.

LIBERTY MEANS PACKARD. Emlin S. Hare, president of the Packard Motor Company, declared on March 12, that the Liberty Motor had been turned over to the government by that company; the motor representing some $500,000 in investments and three years' work on the part of the Packard engineers. The motor is a twin six. On March 13 it was announced that the first fighting seaplane equipped with a Liberty Motor had been tried out and accepted, and that a big fleet would soon be added to the forces engaged in submarine-hunting. America's quantity production is already beginning to tell, over 2,000 airplanes having been completed, and many motors having been shipped abroad.

THE SECOND RED CROSS DRIVE. In the week from May 20 to 27 the American Red Cross will come before the American people with a request for another $100,000,000. The first campaign had already on March 1, resulted in collections of $105,000,000, of which $77,721,918 had been appropriated, France receiving $31,000,000. All the expenses of the Red Cross work are paid by the membership fees; every dollar collected from these drives being used for the work for which it is subscribed.

GOING DRY. While the New York legislature was sidestepping the prohibition issue, the Senate of Rhode Island defeated a resolution for the ratification of the Federal Prohibition Amendment and the legislature of Texas passed a bill which will make the state practically bone dry on April 15, and absolutely dry after the fifteenth of June. On March 11 new regulations were promulgated in Canada by which all of the dominion, except the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, will go dry April 1, and these two provinces will follow on December 31.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Secretary McAdoo announced on March 11 an issue of $500,000,000 of treasury certificates at 4½ per cent. On March 13 it was announced that the total issue of treasury certificates, which would be met by the sale of the third Liberty Loan, had at that date reached $1,255,000,000. . . . Great Britain, on March 12, announced further restrictions on the brewing industry to save 200,000 tons of grain yearly. . . . The Senate on March 13 adopted the conference report on the Railroad Bill after the conferees had eliminated an amendment forbidding the states to increase railroad taxes. The House concurred on March 14.

UP WITH THE SUN. The House of Representatives on March 15, voting 252 to 40, passed the Day-light Saving Bill, previously passed by the Senate, the House, however, including April and October in the new regulations. The Senate on March 16 concurred in this extension. According to the act standard time in the United States will be divided into five zones, and the time in these zones based upon the 75th, 90th, 105th, 120th, and 150th degrees of west longitude, the last including only Alaska. At 2 o'clock A. M. of the last Sunday in March of each year standard time is to be advanced one hour, and at 2 o'clock A. M. of the last Sunday in October it is to be returned once more to the astronomical time. It is estimated that, with time thus measured, thousands of people will be given an extra hour for recreation and outdoor work, insuring the success of many thousands of home gardens, and that in addition the lighting saved will represent a large reduction in the consumption of coal.

The Progress of the War

SWEEPING low over the German trenches, American observers with French pilots, on March 12, saw some 200 gas-projectors being made ready for a monstrous gas attack upon the American trenches. The positions were photographed, the photographs developed, and in a very short time the American batteries were playing a tattoo on the German positions; the gas-projectors were quickly destroyed and there was no attack. On the following day four more groups of these projectors were destroyed by American artillery fire. This sector, which was referred to when the Americans first reached France as a quiet sector of the Lorraine front, has in the last two weeks become one of the most active. The Germans apparently started out to show the American troops the exact nature of war. Following the repulse of the first two attacks, the Americans began to do a little illustrating on their own account.

On March 5 the Rainbow Division of National Guard troops repelled a wicked attack made with flame-projectors, gas, and other devices of frightfulness. On the 10th American troops made three big raids in cooperation with the French in the neighborhood of Luneville. Advancing behind a sweeping barrage the raiders ran past the Germans' first line, penetrated to the second line. They found the positions leveled by artillery fire and the enemy gone from the first line. On the second line strong points and dugouts were bombed and destroyed. The Americans returned, after 45 minutes in the enemy's positions, without the loss of a man. Many dead Germans were found in the positions.

On the 11th the Americans without French support again raided the German positions in the same sector. The German artillery reply to the American bombardment was speedily silenced. This time the raiders advanced behind a box barrage, the exploding shells of the protecting screen forming three sides of a rectangle, thus protecting the flanks of the raiders. Another American party raided German trenches south of Richecourt on March 12. Thus for a week Americans have carried the battle into the enemy's territory, preventing his contemplated attacks, destroying his material, shattering his guns, and, judging by the fact that the Germans fled before the last two attacks, somewhat weakening his morale. On the 14th American troops occupied, held and consolidated over a mile of German first line trenches. The new trenches being in higher ground improve the American position.

The Germans, on March 16, attacked the American forces in his old trenches near Luneville, but was unable to dislodge them. On the extreme right of the sector near Toul German raiders succeeded in entering the American forward positions but were promptly driven out.

Secretary Baker was in conference with General Pershing in Paris on March 10, and it was announced that he would make an inspection of every detail of the American line, communications, and training camps before returning home. The cruiser on which the Secretary went abroad was a part of the convoy of 10,000 troops. The trip was made without sighting a submarine, although there were two scares.

The total losses of the American troops in France were given on March 17 as: Killed in action 144, killed by accident 141, died of disease 659, lost at sea 237, died of wounds 28, executed 1, civilians 7, gassed 6, suicide 11, unknown cause 14, wounded 573, captured 21, and missing 14—total killed, wounded and missing, 1,856.

English and French troops also continued to make raids in force on the German lines during the week; the French being especially active in Lorraine and Alsace. In Champagne, west of Monte Carnillet, the French, on March 15, recovered certain trench elements which they had lost on March 1st. The English were most active in the neighborhoods of St. Quentin, Cambrai and Ypres, their long-range guns bombarding Cambrai. The Germans have not permitted the French or British to conduct raids without counter-raids.

French troops, west of Avocourt near Verdun, on March 17, entered German trenches on a front of 1,400 meters, penetrating some 800 meters. Berlin claimed the capture of 200 prisoners in the repulse of this raid. The Germans attacked in Champagne near Mont Carnillet, being repulsed by the French.

Aside from an attempt of the Austrians to cross the Piave, which was frustrated by the destruction of their boats by Italian artillery, the Italian front was comparatively quiet during the week. There was some indication of a beginning of a Bulgarian drive in Macedonia. In Palestine the British continued to press northward from Jerusalem.

While the fighting on the ground was little different from the week preceding, activity in the air increased considerably. The Germans again bombarded Paris on March 9, some 60 machines crossing the battle line, of which only a few reached the capital. Thirteen persons were killed and 50 hurt. Zeppelins again appeared over England on the nights of March 12 and 13, but were unable to penetrate far inland. The port of Hull was bombed both nights, one woman dying of fright under the first bombardment. Hartlepool received four bombs on March 14, which killed five persons and injured nine. British airmen in the first ten days of March maintained control of the air over the British front, destroying 39 German planes and forcing down 40 others, losing 15 machines themselves. On March 14, 24 German machines were downed at the cost of 5 Britishers.

Submarines during the week sank 15 British vessels over 1,600 tons, 3 under that tonnage. Four French ships under 1,600 tons were sunk, while one Italian of over 1,500 and one of less was sunk. Two Norwegian ships were torpedoed during the week. A German submarine on March 10 attacked the British hospital ship, Guilford Castle, homeward bound from South Africa, as she was entering the Bristol Channel, but her pumps were able to control the water and she made port. She had 450 wounded aboard.

Turkish troops on March 14 occupied the city of Erzerum in Turkish Armenia, overcoming the resistance offered by the Armenians, who with the Georgians are reported to have an army of 250,000 ready to defend the districts in the Caucasus surrendered to Turkey by the Bolsheviks.

GERMANY'S secret plans of conquest have been again brought to the light in a remarkable manner by the publication of a secret communication sent by Berlin to Vienna last year, outlining Germany's intentions. It was written by the then Chancellor Michaelis, and through some means fell into the hands of Hugo Haase, leader of the Independent Socialists in the Reichstag, and was read by him to the Main Committee of that body. The following significant passages are quoted from the secret communication of Chancellor Michaelis:

"The motive of all of Germany's acts is the lack of territory, both for the development of commerce and colonization. Germany has to solve two problems—the freedom of the seas and the opening of a route to the southeast. And these two problems can only be solved through the destruction of England. . . .

"Our object is the permanent securing of the German Empire in Central Europe and the extension of its territory. No one who understands the significance of this war can doubt that, in spite of our wish to be moderate, we shall not allow ourselves to be deterred from extending the borders of the empire and from, under all circumstances, annexing such territories as are fitted for colonization and are not subjected to the influence of the sea power.

"We can weaken her (Russia) materially by taking away her border territories, the Baltic provinces. By using skillful policies the Baltic provinces can easily be Germanized. They will be settled with Germans and their population will double itself. That is the reason why they must be annexed. . . . The frontier between the German Empire and Poland must be materially altered.

"In the Vosges, the boundary line must be improved by the annexation of some valleys, so that the German frontier troops can no longer be fired upon from French territory. France will lose Briey and a strip of land west of Luxembourg. The value of Briey in an economic and military sense is evident from the fact that 16,000,000 tons of iron ore are produced there. For the safeguarding of the German and Luxembourg iron industry, Longwy must remain in our hands."

These extracts are from a document which promises to become historic, as showing the real purpose of Germany as contrasted with the profuse declarations made by the Chancellor to the Reichstag regarding Germany's desire for peace and its repudiation of any wish to make violent conquests.

Ten feet between you and danger

Would your brakes hold in an emergency like this?

You are speeding peacefully along when suddenly a fire-engine shoots out of a side street. There is ten feet leeway in which to stop. You jam home the brakes and the engine goes across in front of you.

That ten feet was space enough because your brakes held.

Five hundred times a year your brakes have stood between you and an unfortunate accident. But because they have always responded, don't grow careless of them.

Know the condition of your brakes

A simple inspection now and then will insure continued safety.

Have your garage man look at your brakes today. Possibly only a simple adjustment is necessary to increase their efficiency.

If they need relining have him put on Thermoid Brake Lining. It will give certain safety for the longest time for three reasons.

1. More material, greater service—

There is over 40% more material and 60% more labor used in the manufacture of Thermoid Brake Lining than in any woven brake lining.

2. Grapnalized—Thermoid Brake Lining is Grapnalized, an exclusive process which creates resistance to moisture, oil and gasoline. Thermoid is impervious to any kind of moisture.

3. Hydraulic compressed, uniform throughout—Every square inch of Thermoid is hydraulic compressed at a pressure of 2,000 pounds. It must give uniform service until worn cardboard-thin. Thermoid is uniform all the way through. It cannot compress in service. There are no soft spots to wear out.

Have your dealer inspect your brakes today. He will show you Thermoid Brake Lining that you may see why it is so different, so efficient and long wearing. If he hasn't Thermoid we will gladly send a sample.

Our guarantee: Thermoid will make good or—WE WILL.

Brake Inspection Movement

Prominent officials, leading clubs and organizations and motorists everywhere have endorsed this big national movement to reduce automobile accidents, by having all brakes inspected before the touring season begins and regularly thereafter. Give it your support.

$\frac{V^2}{10.8}$ Will your car do this?

Automobile engineers have proved that when brake mechanism is right and road conditions average, any car should stop at distances and speeds given by the chart.

V^2 means the square of the velocity or speed of your car; 10.8 is the proved factor of retardation under average road conditions. This factor decreases on smooth, slippery roads to 6.7 and increases as high as 17.4 on rough, worn roads. The chart represents the average condition, and other conditions can readily be figured by changing the factor within the given limits.

Remember that your brake mechanism is not "right" unless its brake lining has the ideal co-efficient of friction. The better the brake lining the quicker your stop.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

General Allenby, commander of the Allied forces which took Jerusalem, saluting a representative of the Christian clergy, who came to learn the will of the deliverers regarding the people of the Holy City

JERUSALEM was half emptied of its population; some had fled, some had been expelled. Of those who remained, all men who could be pressed into military service had been taken by the government, even men who were partially disabled. Aside from those drafted into military service, a large number were compelled to serve in civil capacities, to make roads, to engage in transportation activities, and so forth.

On every side one saw houses closed, with doors and windows fastened. One remembered that here such a one had lived, and active life had flourished within these walls; but now it was as if the plague had passed by. The houses and schools surrounded by gardens, where hundreds of children had played, were silent as the tomb. It was said in Jerusalem that the exiled children continued their studies in tents in Samaria. In the interior of the city, half of the shops were closed.

The inhabitants who still remained in Jerusalem were subjected to the exploitation of the government and the ravages of famine and disease. Army officials, both Turk and German, monopolized the food supplies and other provisions and sold them to the population at high prices, while there was a constantly depreciating rate of coinage. Even their own Turkish notes decreased in value. They would receive payment in paper, but counted it at the gold or silver value, to the loss of the purchaser. Thus a kilo of flour (about two pounds weight) cost $2—ten francs. After robbing their own hospitals of all supplies, medicines, instruments, linens, food and provisions, of course the Turkish officials made no ceremony in commandeering all the hospital supplies of the Jews and Christians. Hence when epidemics broke out, malarial fever, typhoid, typhus and dysentery, there were no means of properly caring for the sick, and the mortality increased from day to day. There was not one house from which some member of the family had not been lost by deportation, exile, or death.

THE intense anger of the authorities—the Turks and Germans—was concentrated upon the Zionists. Every day orders were received giving long lists of names, including whole families, who were to be deported to the north, to Damascus, or to the interior of Turkey, to Constantinople, Sivas or Angora.

Jerusalem's Day of Gladness

The Story of Its Deliverance by the Allies on the Day of the "Feast of Miracles"

By GENEVIEVE COWLES

THE remarkable events preceding and connected with the liberation of Jerusalem are here recounted for the first time, being taken by permission from recent private letters to a well-known Hebrew authoress, a refugee from Jerusalem, and transcribed from her lips. The Christian Herald, which is privileged to publish this wonderful narrative of personal experiences, has received full assurance of its authenticity.

Jemal Pasha no longer resided at Jerusalem. They call him "Jemal le Grand Chameau" (the Great Camel), in contrast to another Jemal, a military commander called the Little Camel. But the Pasha who took his place was, if possible, even worse. The populace of Jerusalem had surnamed him "Pasha Rasha," the Cruel Pasha. He executed his orders with ferocity. For example, he proclaimed that those who hid themselves to escape deportation should be condemned to death if discovered by the authorities. Executions had become a daily event in Jerusalem.

AFTER the Zionists had been deported or executed, the Americans became the chief object of hatred on the part of the government. By Americans one means all those who were registered as American subjects and enjoyed the protection of the United States. They were all named in the official lists, and their deportation, to the number of one hundred and twenty persons, was announced. They were to be deported to Damascus. Of course there was no expectation that the government would provide them with means of transportation or with provisions. They were expected to march on foot along the miserable trails, under the pouring rains and in the bitter winds of winter, suffering all the risks liable to arise from exposure and exhaustion. One young woman, an American subject, who was ill with fever, begged permission to remain behind until the fever should have subsided; her request was refused. The authorities insisted upon her departure with the American contingent, and she was carried in a litter. Americans were arrested in the streets and in houses, and in every place where the officials supposed they might be in hiding they were hunted and apprehended when found. One young man, an American, the director of an important concern, was seized in his place of concealment, put in irons and sent in fetters to Damascus. He has not been heard from since. A few Americans who enjoyed the special protection of the Germans received carriages as far as Nablous. The United States government refrained from declaring war against the Turks, that the lives of American subjects in the Turkish Empire might not be endangered. Here is the proof that Turkey will not respect Americans within her borders.

The establishment called "The American Colony," situated near the Tombs of the Kings, escaped persecution. From the beginning of the war the members of this colony had organized themselves as a sort of Red Cross Aid, working under the orders of the Turkish government. These colonists were enlisted from various nationalities, including Swedes, English, Germans, converted Jews, Christian Arabs, and a few Americans, including the founder of the institution, Mrs. Spafford.

WHEN the deportation of the Americans had been satisfactorily accomplished by the authorities, they began to make arrests without any formal accusation. They apprehended people in the houses and on the streets, and cast them into prison as objects of immediate deportation. Among these prisoners there was the consul of Holland, Mr. Hofian, and other prominent Jews.

Pasha Rasha, the "Cruel Pasha," was so magnanimous toward these distinguished personages that he allowed them the privilege of three days' notice before they were deported, while the others, including the Americans, had been hurried off instantly without any time for preparation.

By this time the cannon on the fortifications of Jerusalem were directed against Rama, the site of Nebi Samuel (the tomb of Samuel), which was already occupied by the English forces. The eyes of the inhabitants of the Holy City were also directed toward the Nebi Samuel, with the prayer that the English might arrive quickly.

Unexpectedly a new order was proclaimed by Jemal Pasha, expelling from Jerusalem all the Jews and all the Christians! One can imagine the panic which seized upon the population. Even the Turkish officials were themselves embarrassed how to execute the sinister command—how to carry off practically the mass of the inhabitants of the city. But they counted upon the support of the Germans, who had experience and system in such matters.

The unfortunate multitudes condemned to deportation saw no means of salvation. They hastened to hide themselves in subterranean passages and in various other places of concealment where they could possibly hope to elude the evil hand that sought to destroy them.

It was in this darkness that the Jews awaited the approach of their greatest national patriotic festival, the "Feast of Lights"—the "Feast of the Miracles" of ancient days, Hannucca, which should now take place in a few hours.

When the sun had set and the city of Jerusalem was glorified with the rosy light of the Oriental after-glow, the miracle was accomplished—the English had arrived!

WHEN the next morning dawned over the city which had been so long desolated by famine, pestilence, terror and death, there was established the reign of a righteous peace. The great news of the joy of deliverance passed from mouth to mouth. All those who were hidden in holes and in subterranean passages came out into the light. The people threw themselves upon the necks of the English soldiers and embraced them crying, "We have prayed for you day and night!"

Jewish women made their way toward the synagogues, carrying with them the pots of oil, the offerings of the vows which they had made for deliverance. Arab Christian women carried their "oil of offering" to the Christian shrines. And the protecting English flag waved from the Tower of David. From day to day life revived. Bread was distributed, the sick cared for, the schools and shops were opened.

Hebrew, the language of the prophets, was proclaimed as the official language, with English and Arabic. The Jews heard openly from the lips of the English victors this message: "The land which we conquer is for you." The heart of the Jew oppressed for centuries now overflowed with joy.

During the years of suffering under the Turkish yoke a young Hebrew composer, his heart inflamed with passion for his country, had commenced an opera of the ancient Jewish kingdom based upon the research of music of Jewish life. He finished his opera by the light of a small lamp of olive oil in a dark cellar, while the thunder of cannon was heard in artillery fire between the Holy City and Nebi Samuel. This opera is named "Iftah" (Jephtha) and the composer is Abraham Zevi. His name as an exile was Edelson.

JOY continued for the eight days of the Feast of Hannucca. The daily life at Jerusalem has become like a fête, because the sense of deliverance is so great and the assurance of protection is exultant.

Only the mayor of the city, Hassan Effendi El Hussein, had an air of sadness. What was there passing in his soul? He had been previously a great friend of France, England and America. But in his later years a change had come over him. When the great war commenced, his sympathies were divided. At one time he was for the Central Powers; at another, he was in favor of the Allies. However, when Turkey entered the war, Hassan Effendi declared himself openly pro-German. He became alienated from his best friends, who were loyal to the Allies. In some cases he abstained even from defending his own associates. He permitted the Germans to have a free hand in Jerusalem, and he failed to protect his intimate friends, who were subjected to deportation. He did not use his influence with the military in behalf of the unfortunates who were condemned. The execution of the edict of deportation was carried out entirely by the military.

It was the destiny of Hassan Effendi to surrender Jerusalem to the English arms. He graciously placed the keys of the Holy City in the hands of one stronger to rule than himself—Allenby!

But this act caused him sorrowful emotions, and a short time later he fell sick, and after two weeks of illness he died!

Does the Bible Teach a General Judgment?

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

FURTHER questions raised by the previous articles of prophecy related to the interpretation of various passages in the book of Revelation culminating in its teaching concerning the last judgment. Most of them were too lacking in general interest to warrant attention in this special way; but an exception is made of one which asks whether Rev. 17:8 refers to a "limited atonement." The passage reads, "And they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the Book of Life from the foundation of the world."

The thought of the atonement is not to be excluded from these words, but it is not in the foreground. The subject of the whole verse is the "beast," the Antichrist, the secular despot, possibly an incarnation of Satan, who will ascend out of the abyss and later go into perdition, and who will rule over the earth during the period of the tribulation still ahead. For further information about him, consult the article on "The Antichrist, His History and His Doom" (Christian Herald, August 29, 1917).

"They that dwell on the earth shall wonder after him," or, as Rev. 13:3 says, "all the world wondered after the beast." And no wonder they wondered, when we are told in another Scripture (II Thess. 2:4) that "he sitteth in the temple of God, setting himself forth as God," and in still another (Rev. 13:2-17), that there is a false prophet with him who "deceiveth them that dwell on the earth, by reason of the miracles which he had power to do." "Wonder" in this case means not simple astonishment, but a surrender of will and judgment, bringing the one who wonders under the sway and spell of the one who is wondered at.

Yet as the verse states, this will not be true of all. In Elijah's time there was an elect remnant who bowed not the knee to Baal (Rom. 11:1-5), and so will it be in the great tribulation. Although the Church will have been caught up to meet the Lord in the air, as we believe the Scriptures teach (I Thess. 4:17), yet there will be an elect remnant on the earth, both of Jews and Gentiles—converted it may be by the very event of the Church's translation—who will prefer death to allegiance to this son of perdition. (Read Rev. 6:9-11; 7:14; 13:15-17). These are described by contrast, in the question presented to us, as those whose names were "written in the Book of Life from the foundation of the world."

What troubles the inquirer is that some names were written there while others were not, and only the first are saved, while the others presumably are lost. His is a doctrinal or theological question that hardly comes within the range of these articles, which cannot properly discuss such matters as a limited or an unlimited atonement. But this much may be said, doubtless without controversy: (1) that the book and the writing of the names are figures of speech, indicating God's foreknowledge of the saved and the lost; (2) that his foreknowledge is not necessarily identical with his foreordination of some to eternal life and some to eternal death; (3) that the atonement of Jesus Christ is sufficient for the sin of the world (John 1:29); (4) that all may be saved who are willing to be saved (Rev. 22:17).

II

THIS leads to the question of the final judgment referred to in Rev. 20:11-15, where the words recur: "Whosoever was not found written in the Book of Life was cast into the lake of fire." This was dealt with in the article on "The Day of the Lord, When It Comes and What It Means" (Christian Herald, September 12, 1917), where it was said that it is erroneously called the "general" judgment. By the "general" judgment is commonly understood a judgment of all mankind at one time and one place and on precisely the same basis, which does not appear to be the Bible's teaching on that subject.

But, says the inquirer, what about Rom. 14:10; II Cor. 5:10, and Matt. 25:31-46? These passages will be quoted later, but in the meantime let us reflect that the day of judgment, as presented in the Bible, is not a day of twenty-four hours merely, but one covering a great length of time. "The Day of the Lord," mentioned before, is equivalent to the day of judgment, and it covers at least a thousand years, beginning with judgment, ending with judgment, and characterized by judgment more or less, all the way through.

I. There is a judgment of Christians, true believers, the members of Christ's body, which will take place when Christ comes for his church. It is to this that Rom. 14:10 and II Cor. 5:10 apply. The first reads: "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ." And the second, "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." The pronoun "we" in these cases refers only to Christians, as may be seen from the contexts, and especially from the introduction to both epistles (see Rom. 1:1, 7 and II Cor. 1:1). This is not a judgment unto condemnation, but rather an inquiry into the conduct of disciples, in order to give unto them "before the eyes of all a gracious reward of tried fidelity," as Van Costerzee expresses it. Compare further I Cor. 3:2-15.

II. There is a judgment awaiting Israel as a nation, which shall take place on the earth, and doubtless with particular intensity in Palestine, whither that nation will have returned at first in an unconverted state. The time will be after the translation of the Church, and when Christ will be revealed with his saints and with his holy angels for the deliverance of the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble such as there never was since there was a nation, even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." That it is a final judgment for some of them at least seems involved in the language which follows: "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

III

THERE is a judgment of the Gentile nations, also on the earth, commencing perhaps with the judgment upon Israel and following after it. It is to this that Matt. 25:31-46 applies, beginning: "When the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats."

Observe that those who are here judged are called "nations," and the meaning is living nations, i.e., nations existing on the earth at the time. It does not refer to those who have died, and nothing is said about a resurrection having taken place. For parallel scriptures see Isa. 34:1, 2; Ezek. 39, the whole chapter, where, as in other instances in the Old Testament, the word "heathen" should be rendered "nations"; Joel 3:2; Zech. 14:1, 2.

Observe also that the ground on which this judgment is passed is peculiar, different from any other judgment named or to be named. The sheep are divided from the goats according to the kindness or unkindness shown to a third class of persons called the "brethren" of the Judge. This third class is taken to mean Israel or the Jews, and doubtless during the tribulation period. There is no mention of a formal trial here and no opening of books, but "a calling up of rebellious or obedient subjects and the passing upon them of their sentence of penalty or reward." Nothing could be more distinct from the circumstances of the last judgment, which will be spoken of in a moment. And yet there is a finality to this also, for they that have done wickedly go into everlasting punishment, "but the righteous into life eternal." For comparative scripts, see Jer. 25:15-33; Dan. 2:44, 45; 7:9-14; Joel 3:2; also II Thess. 2:8; Jude 14, 15; Rev. 19:11-21.

That there is much difficulty in the application or interpretation of certain parts of this scene of judgment is not disputed, but it would require more than one article of the present length to deal with it in any satisfactory way. Here we can speak only in general terms and state conclusions in broad outlines.

IV

THERE is a final judgment (Rev. 22:11-15). (1) Note the time, after the thousand years (9-10). How long after is not revealed; but whether it be brief or extended, it clearly differentiates it from all preceding judgments. (2) Note the location, not in heaven, neither on earth, for the time has come foretold by Peter, "in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up" (II Peter 3:10). (3) Note the characterization of the judged. They are the dead; and by "the dead" is doubtless meant all who have died from the very beginning, excepting those who have been judged in the earlier periods. In other words: all men will be judged at some time. There will be no exception to this rule; but the judgment will not be general in that all will be judged together and by precisely the same rule. (4) Note the record and the basis of the judgment: "they were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." No believers are in this judgment, it would appear, for the thought of faith appears to be excluded from it, as well as that of reward. See also Christ's promise in John 5:24. There are two stages in this judgment as another puts it: first, a reference to the "other books" to show that the works of the wicked deserve death; and second, the opening of "the Book of Life," to show that by unbelief they have rejected life. (5) Note the awful sentence of the judgment; "the second death," "the lake of fire."

May God deliver the reader from it. And this will he do beyond a peradventure, to all who receive the Lord Jesus Christ as Saviour and confess him as Lord.

The church at Rembercourt after German gunners had completed their work of destruction

GERMANY has swept a wide path of devastation and destruction across eastern France and one of the things that strikes home most forcibly on one who has seen this area is the tremendous amount of destruction that was done merely for the sake of destroying. Take, for example, the little village of Rembercourt, near Verdun. The Germans never entered it. They fought a battle on the hills southeast of the town, where the struggle went on for four days. And during that time they shelled Rembercourt constantly. They shelled it so effectively that the church, dating from the twelfth century, was destroyed and only one house in the town was left with a roof on it.

A few miles away is Beuzee. Neither French nor German soldiers marched through its few streets. But the Germans stopped on the nearby hills long enough to batter the church to pieces and drop shells through the roofs of half the houses in the village. Royanmeix is another town in this region that has suffered the same fate. The Germans were not there, but they got near enough to throw their shells into it, and throw them they did. There was no military object, for they were retreating at the time, their road had not passed through Royanmeix nor were the French soldiers following them on that road. But the village was there. It offered a good target, and the Germans shelled it.

The same is true on every sector of the front. I have traveled the whole distance, from the North Sea to the Swiss border, and there is not one place where I have not seen this furious and frightful destruction. I have seen whole villages razed to the ground—not a house left standing, not a shelter for man or beast.

Two of the places that recall themselves to me with especial distinctness are Betheny, northeast of Rheims, and the valley that stretches itself out from the foot of the massif of the Moulin des Vents, near Fort St. Thierry. Both are within the French lines. One mounts the hill from Rheims to Betheny, and I suppose what the Germans disliked about it was that it commanded a splendid view. So they set about their work of destruction. And they did it very methodically, just as they accomplished the ruin of Rheims. An officer in the front line trenches told me that every day at three o'clock four German shells whistled over his head and fell in Rheims. They were timed so exactly that he set his watch daily by the first shell. I never heard that watches were set by the shelling of Betheny, but the work had been done with such precision that there was only one place left in the village that had any resemblance to a shelter.

It was the church, and the reason it resembled a shelter was that in one corner the soldiers had put up a rough board roof from the wreckage strewn in the streets and constructed an altar from the fragments of stone. The walls of the church were battered in, the tower lay in the roadway, and the roof was mangled and splintered, unrecognizable pieces of something that might once have been an entity lying on the floor in an unformed mass. The soldiers had cleared away the debris in one corner and built their little chapel. From time to time a German shell knocked another piece of the wall through the new imitation roof, and it had to be repaired. Every time a storm came the chapel had to be rebuilt. The day I was there two soldiers were clearing up after a storm, while the soldier priest was industriously rearranging the altar pieces that had been scattered by the explosion of a shell in another corner of the church.

There is something tremendously inspiring in these chapels at the front. When man thinks of God under a rain of shells, God is real and personal and very close. He takes shape, assumes a certain substance and becomes definite. I was speaking of this one day to a French officer.

"Yes," he said, "there is a very close connection between God and battle. One cannot say with precision what it is, but war seems to bring a realization of other things. Many of our priests were soldiers first."

BUT there is another point to be mentioned in connection with the churches in the battle zone and that is the mania of the Germans for destroying them, for a mania it seems to be. I stood in the road at Ablains-St.-Nazaire, in Artois, two hundred yards from the church and saw the Germans drop shell after shell on what remained of the structure. Some soldiers had been clearing up the debris after the last bombardment. They retired half way to us and the two groups stood and watched the destruction. We were perfectly safe as long as we stayed beyond the range of flying fragments of stone and steel. For the church was the target and there was not the slightest danger that a shell would fall elsewhere.

And that brings me to my second place, the valley at the foot of the massif of the Moulin des Vents. It is a valley that lies like a landlocked harbor surrounded by high wooded hills. On its peaceful surface are dotted three towns—Pouillon and Villers-Franqueux at the foot of the hills and Thil, like an island in the plain. Out beyond Thil a straight line of white road runs and on the far side of the road are Courey and Loivre, while in the distant haze are Briemont and the woods and château of Briemont.

Standing on the wooded slopes of the massif, one looks down into Pouillon, Villers-Franqueux and Thil. No inhabitant is left in any of the three villages and one literally looks down into them—looks down into the empty houses through the great holes gaping in the roofs. They are withered skeletons of homes that were, poor, pitiful relics of happiness that was. And here again the churches have been the special targets of the German cannon. Walls of houses stand, splintered ends of roof beams still sway gently in the breeze. But the churches are razed to the ground.

THE church of Thil is like a Roman relic standing in a graveyard where time and weather and neglect have despoiled the graves. Where was the altar is a heap of powdered masonry. Behind it is the one section of wall that still bears a measure of resemblance to its former self. And that is all.

I do not remember another point where such a wide panorama of the destructive fury of the Germans is to be seen, unless it is the flat fields of Belgium, where the eye can embrace three towns in one sweep. And there it is the same story of roofless houses, walls half standing and the churches the special targets. I remember the church of Pervyse as a most grim and desolate spectacle.

It had stood in the center of a little place or square, and all the houses surrounding the square were leveled. At a little distance there was here and there a wall, but nothing around the square but broken bricks and mortar scattered over the ground. In the center was the end wall of the church with a transverse section of the belfry still rising from it. Parts of the side walls stood and from them pieces of the skeleton framework of the roof projected themselves. Tall grass and weeds sprang through the great cracks in the old stone floor. Gray clouds lowered overhead and cannon boomed in the distance. It was grim and grisly, indeed.

THERE is one other place from which I recall a great panorama of war's destruction, but it I saw in the midst of battle. It was from the heights of Vaux on the north bank of the Somme, during the great combined French and British offensive in 1916. Vaux was at my feet, to the right was Curlu and to the left Bray-sur-Somme. On the low plateau across the marshy river bed were the site of Dompierre and the ruins of Herbecourt and Hergnicourt, while in the far distance were the white houses of Mont St. Quentin, dominating Peronne, hidden in the valley around the bend of the river. Between us and Mont St. Quentin was the wall of smoke and earth, rising and falling, like the spring tide rolling in on an ocean beach, built and rebuilt by the French and British shells falling with unrelenting precision on the German lines.

Vaux, at our feet, was a stunted, uninhabitable ruin. Curlu was a splash of red devastation on a white field. Bray-sur-Somme was a collection of shell-wrecked houses, where the inhabitants lived in the cellars. Dompierre was a memory. Herbecourt and Hergnicourt were two sections of wall four feet high and a few stones scattered in the fields and along the road. Mont St. Quentin awaited its fate.

Such is German-made war. No thing that God made or man loved remains in the path over which it has swept, but a deep and abiding horror of it and all that it means, of the spirit that made it and keeps it in being, lies in the soul of all who have known it.

In the name of humanity, buy Liberty Bonds and help to end this frightful scourge.

Before the Iconostas in Russia

The Multitude of Churches Which Still Flourish Despite the Revolution—By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

TO ignore the Church in Russian affairs is to notice the transitory and remain oblivious to the eternal. At a time when Russia is in an acute state of political, economic and social revolution, the Russian Church is undergoing evolution; but it is the greatest stabilizing force in a republic which is still unsteady on its legs. The Church is still regnant among spiritual bodies, for the Russian peasant recognizes the Church as instinctively as he acknowledges God. Temporal affairs are in a state of chaos, but the millions of Russia still bow in worship.

Russia is a land of religion. From every urban hill, the glittering domes of churches rise above the relative monotony of Russia's regular sky-line. In every village scene the church steeple tops the view and white-walled houses of worship add a touch of life to the deep green of sheltering forests. Small chapels stand beside the metropolitan thoroughfares, tiny oases of devotion among the bustling marts of trade. As the street cars pass the bronze portals of great churches, passengers release their hold upon the straps to cross themselves. The Russian soul seeks entity and finds it only in the invisible.

The Russian church is not only the setting for scenes of unparalleled pomp and splendor, but also the haven of the sin-sick soul and the humble worshiper who bows in true repentance before a forgiving God. It is not only the shrine for those whose religious sense is satisfied by kissing sacred ikons, but also for those who seek, behind the gilt of banner and the jeweled portraiture, the Being whose presence is felt but not perceived. Here superstition lives, but here, too, reverence finds expression. These mighty monuments mock the One to whom their domes are raised, but in the cool recesses of their naves, distress gives way to peace and selfishness to love. It is so with churches everywhere.

ONE of the queerest churches in Russia is the Cathedral of St. Basil, in Moscow, which a wicked ruler raised in memory of the conquest of Kazan. Its dozen domes remind one of the nightmares of cubists and futurists. They might well crown a temple of bacchanalian orgies rather than a Christian shrine. The weird decorations of the bulging domes, "like upturned beets," are painted in such colors as a child would choose, and sealy shapes like pineapples are topped with glittering spires. Three centuries of rain and sleet have done their best to soften and to heal, but zigzags, knobs and dizzy whirls distinguish the exterior view.

The interior is divided into eleven small chapels connected by doorways so low that all must bow in passing. It might typify the Russian tendency to split into irregular and insignificant sects instead of uniting in a truly worthy whole. Above the central chapel there rises a lofty dome, yet so narrow are the confines of the chapel that it seems more like a well.

The labyrinthine huddle of mean rooms is confusing and unimposing; yet a friend who visited the church said it was the first one that ever caused him to want to buy a candle and worship. St. Basil's will always remind me of a warty toad, whose ugliness age cannot efface, rather than some simple parthenon whose beauty time is powerless to destroy. But in the early morning mists, as one sees it silhouetted against a leaden sky, from beneath the arch of the Iberian Gate the motley domes of St. Basil take on a dignity and charm which remind one of a Maxfield Parrish painting of some fantastic castle in Spain.

To me, none of the ten churches within the Kremlin walls are impressive. Ivan Veliki towers the highest, but it is far from imposing. From one side it resembles a tower rather than a church, yet it has no such quiet dignity as one finds in the Kutab Minar, near Delhi, or the towering dome of St. Sophia with its flanking needle minarets. The other cathedrals are dropped around with careless abandon and a nice disregard for the cost of gold-leaf; but none of them dominates a vista or gathers about itself the other masses in pleasing array. The Kremlin is a mighty whole, composed of many unimposing parts. Its long, red walls and splendid gates produce an effect of simple strength which cannot be found within their portals.

The interiors are as disappointing as are the groups of domes which distinguish the exteriors. None are large, none are truly intimate. The effect is of surplus gilt and multiplicity of saints which remind one of the gopurams of India. Spindle-shanked saints, whose emaciated figures seem too weak to support their gilt halos, alternate with knights in armor.

I ATTENDED a magnificent but impressive service in Uspenski Cathedral, where in earlier days the Czars were crowned. As each prelate entered, he was greeted with a kiss by his fellows. One side of the church was filled with a staging and the center was left vacant, except for a large number of towering priests, with shaggy manes and heavy beards. They were so magnificently dressed that one forgot the rags of the man beside him and the sweaty smell of the man in front. High up in the dome was a giant figure of the Deity, and two shafts of light striking across below it strove to proclaim the presence of life and light to those who crowded the dim cathedral, where the smell of candles and swinging censers smudged the air.

A giant priest with a voice of a dull monotone chanted something in some foreign tongue, while from the heights of Ivan Veliki there sounded a tonal background of booming bells. The masses of people crossed themselves and bowed while the sweet voices of the boy sopranos rose above the bellowed bass. On a score of rotund forms cloth of gold glittered in heavy folds, and everywhere there was the cold glitter of jewels belonging to the Church. Soldiers were there with Red Cross maids, or supported on rude crutches. The seller of candles expertly thumbed over the roll of bills, while a peasant woman stepped out of her light boots and into the rude and heavy ones she would wear on her long trudge home. An old lady with sunken cheeks and tired eyes sought the blessing of a somber priest and kissed his hand in return for his service.

On the red carpet in the center, stately ranks of bearded prelates wearing jeweled miters. Crowded into the darkest corners, the common people. The bird-like notes of the boy singers and the cannon-like boom of the bells. The shaft of sunlight revealing the impurity of the smoke-filled air. The wilting candles in the hands of huge bearded forms in cloth of gold. The masculinity of the service and the femininity of the audience. Uspenski was a scene of contrasts. As a spectacle, the service lacked only dramatic fire to give it life. As a sacred service, it seemed to lack divine fire; and it was with a lifting of the spirits that I stepped forth into the fresh air beneath the unflecked blue.

That night I went back. The service was still in progress. But the two long shafts of light had given up and withdrawn from the alien scene. I went out into the colonnade which surrounds the extravagant monument to Alexander II, and watched the last light of dying day fade away behind the myriad domes of Moscow. Most prominent of all was the great gold bubble of glittering grace that showed the position of the stately Church of the Redeemer. Fifteen million roubles it cost—money wrung from rich and poor to erect a church of undeniable dignity and charm. Fifteen millions, when peasants were hungered, when laborers were sweating in the dim factories belonging to those who paid them small wages and did not allow them to strike. Fifteen millions of roubles spent for a single edifice representing an institution that seemed to many to be the handmaid of governmental oppression.

AS darkness settled down to meet the deepening shadows below the shining domes, I entered the tiny church of St. Alexis. Only one priest was visible, and he was clad in somber black. Sweet voices were raised in song, and around him, dressed in the simple clothes of the peasant women, were the singers, their bright eyes shining in the light of the flickering candles that they held. At one side there was a long row of women and girls waiting to receive a blessing from a priest in a side chapel. There was glitter in this church too, but here was no theatrical display, but life itself. The singers were not professionals, but simple folk whose souls broke forth in simple but charming song.

Late one afternoon I entered the Cathedral of St. Isaac in Petrograd. A soldier with several medals on his breast was kneeling before an ikon representing the crucified Christ. A woman in black crossed the dimly lighted space and knelt in prayer in a dark corner. A white-haired old lady entered on the arm of an erect young man in uniform, who limped along with the aid of a cane. Then a guard noticed me and dragged me away to see pillars of malachite and jeweled ikons. One by one he pointed out the riches of the great show-place, and finally he took me behind the altar and showed me a gilded model of the church in which we were standing. He really expected me to be interested in this vest-pocket edition of the fine old church. He had spoiled it as a house of reflection and worship, and now he dragged me away from its own majesty to see its gold puppet in a glass case! If that isn't a church guide all over again, what is? In England, at Durham, a church guide led me into the very midst of a service to show me the lofty dome. If churches are houses of worship, why allow smooth-mannered men in frock coats to turn them into side-show exhibits in expectation of a trifling tip?

THE church of the Resurrection in Petrograd is in its exterior a newer and more garish St. Basil's, whose architect must have conceived the nightmare domes while in a fit of delirium tremens. The interior contains nearly four times as much mosaic as St. Mark's in Venice. Some of the work is excellent, one bit, containing some lovely Easter lilies, being especially charming. The mosaic which is considered to be the best is a representation of the Crucifixion by Parland, but there are many others, including enough apostles, prophets, martyrs and Church fathers to confuse the most erudite.

The church was built over the spot in the street where Alexander II was mortally wounded in 1881. The pavement has been preserved to show the effect of the explosion, and those with a strong imagination can detect traces of royal blood near by. With the changing seasons this elaborate and expensive church, with jasper, malachite, Ural stones and pearls enough

Church comes to life and attracts worshipers as well as tourists, it will be a meeting-place worthy of the best.

BUT the real shrine of the worshipful Russian is hundreds of miles away, and I have seen ten thousand Russians beneath its humble dome. It is the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem. Beneath its roof are the fourteen stations of the cross and—according to tradition—the exact spot of Calvary.

The Stone of Anointment is there, and in the largest chapel is a stone marking, as the visitor is assured, the exact center of the world's center. The Holy Sepulcher is there, too. In the courtyard of the church sit priests in rich vestments, going through a ceremonious washing of the feet, each of them wearing an emaciated Christ in heavy gold pinned upon his rotund form. On Easter day there bursts forth from the side of the Holy Sepulcher, through metal troughs thoughtfully provided, the Holy Fire to satisfy a five and ten cent store clerk, has changed from a monument of a tyrant to a memorial of the brave but lawless act of a nameless bombardier. No one was worshipping there, but the guide was a fine-looking man of excellent manners, dressed in a fine long coat, with bright brass buttons. The Church of the Resurrection is a fine building, as far as the interior is concerned; and when the Russian from heaven. Such is the credulity of the masses of the pilgrims that it is held as a veritable miracle.

As an awe-inspiring aggregation of renowned religious relics, legends, traditions, miracles and showy display, the Church of the Holy Sepulcher is the unparalleled attraction of the Russian Church, and is probably without a counterpart in the whole world. There is certainly nothing like it in Russia proper.

A GREAT moral and political victory was recently won in Pittsburg because there the churches of fifteen denominations are closely bound together in an organization which makes united action possible. They employ an executive secretary who gives his full time to the directing of their mighty force in the service of their city.

There was a day when the corrupt politicians scoffed at the churches. In fact, they welcomed the antagonism of the churches. Then the church that touched political issues was more likely to be smirched than to effect reform. This is all changing now that churchmen are uniting and voting as they pray. The churches united, using political methods for Christian ends, are becoming a terror to the evil-doers. The plan used in Pittsburg is to so organize the voting power of the churches that every man will be registered, that each voter shall be fully informed regarding issues and candidates, and that each ballot shall be cast as a Christian service to the state.

This plan has been vigorously pursued for five years and in that time the organized Christians of Pittsburg have seen corrupt officials resign and others give up campaigns for reelection, they have seen the red light district abolished and human interests brought to the fore in local politics. Today the average Pittsburg candidate is anxious to deserve the good will of the church folks.

Community Evangelism is another field in which churches are gaining power by united action. City wide evangelism conducted by local church federations is referred to as the Simultaneous Evangelistic Campaign. Each year a greater number of cities adopts this plan. For a large city the success is practically dependent upon an inter-church organization having an executive secretary who can attend to the carrying out of the details of the campaign.

THE city in which this plan has been worked out most carefully and followed up most continuously is Indianapolis. For this reason it has come to be known as the Indianapolis Plan. The secretary of the Indianapolis Federation of Churches, Rev. Morton C. Pearson, thus outlines the program and its practical results:

"The plan comprehends a well-organized campaign beginning September 1 of each year and continuing until Easter Sunday. A strong evangelistic committee

When the Churches Cooperate

By REV. ROY B. GUILD, Secretary Commission on Inter-Church Federation of ministers and laymen including representatives from the Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, Young People's Federation, City Sunday School Association and Adult Bible Class Movement is appointed in the month of May each year. This committee works out an outlined plan of cooperative evangelistic work covering the entire period, each month's program containing some outstanding point of emphasis. This outline of evangelism is then submitted to the Ministers' Association, where it is worked over and finally approved. Each pastor agrees to make it the working program of his church for the period.

"At certain stated times throughout this period of evangelism all the churches of the city are opened for intensive evangelistic effort for two weeks or longer, at which time the Federation conducts great noon down-town theater meetings where the attendance ranges from 800 to 2,000 daily. This noon meeting is thoroughly interdenominational and intensely evangelistic. Usually some outstanding evangelistic pastor is brought to the city to speak at these noon meetings.

"The reports from the churches gathered immediately following last Easter and covering periods of one year each show additions to membership during the first year to be 3,500; the second year, 7,000; the third year, 8,000, and the fourth year, 1917, 8,000."

EVANGELISM and social service are inseparably linked in the program of the united churches. To do this work a new religious order has been developed. It is filled from the ranks of the clergy and the laity. There are now twenty-five executive secretaries in the United States. The number is growing steadily. In a few years it can confidently be expected that there will be more than one hundred such secretaries employed by city and state federations.

No community having two or more churches can adequately meet its religious needs without having some kind of inter-church committee or organization. The tasks being performed by local federations come under two heads: the correction of wrong conditions and influences, and the establishing or strengthening of those that are good. The two words, "corrective" and "constructive," define the two tasks.

Sacramento, Calif., is one of the smallest cities having a full-time executive secretary. The results have more than justified the expense. This in the face of the fact that the Protestant population is proportionately much smaller than in most cities. Yet through organized and continuous cooperation the attitude of powerful elements is being changed.

The Federation has taken the leadership in Sacramento and its vicinity in the fight for a dry California. When it first entered the contest, the church people were so indifferent that it was found that very few had registered. The Federation secured registration deputies in the churches. The registration was so thoroughly conducted that in about one-sixth of the Sacramento precincts a full 100 per cent. of the church vote was finally reached. The Federation was largely instrumental in preventing election frauds and obtaining an honest count. It succeeded in reducing the moist majority in this very wet city 18 per cent. It has already taken local charge of the Dry California Campaign, which precedes the election of November, 1918. The Federation has proceeded upon the theory that religion can not thrive in a community dominated by a ring, supported by the enormous profits from alcohol and vice.

A FEDERATION of Churches is to the religious life of the city what the Chamber of Commerce is to the commercial and industrial life of the city. No truly modern city can get along without both. By a federation of churches is meant the churches themselves as churches, consulting and cooperating officially, through accredited delegates, for all accepted common tasks. The reason for forming a federation is found in a common task which cannot be performed by the churches working separately. The need may be a campaign for the enforcement of law or the organization of the amusements of the city or the development of a Bible teachers' training school which will make the Sunday schools even better than the public schools. A survey of the city will reveal plenty of reasons for getting together and working hard. Charity workers, hospital guilds, professional evangelists, reformers can mobilize the churches for a campaign, but the churches have lacked the ability to mobilize themselves.

The Great Western Offensive Opens

THE great German offensive on the western front, which began on March 21, developed speedily until it attained unprecedented proportions. It soon became apparent that the immense resources of the Teutonic powers had been far larger than could have been foreseen, and that Germany was prepared to make enormous sacrifices to attain its purpose. In the first four days of the fight, the Allies' lines, from Arras on the north to La Fère in the south, were pierced to depths varying from seven to eleven miles. At the outset, on Thursday March 21 (the first day of Spring), the attack was largely confined to the Cambrai section, on ground which had already been made famous by the fierce struggles of last Fall. Spreading with inconceivable rapidity, the conflict soon became general up and down the long line. St. Quentin, which the British had threatened since the establishment of the Hindenburg line, was the center of the main attack at the end of the second day. The first, second and third British lines were successively forced back by the massed Teutonic forces, although the cost of their advance was a tremendous toll of human life, the solid German ranks presenting a point-blank target for the British machine-guns and heavy artillery.

On Saturday, March 23, the battle had spread over a front of fully fifty miles, and was still reaching southward. The Allied defenders held their line stubbornly, and the positions one by one were only relinquished when it became evident that there was danger of a turning movement on the south. All night Saturday the battle raged furiously, but the Germans, despite losses, would not be denied. The sacrifice of life in this bitter struggle was probably the heaviest that has been known during the present war.

Sunday, March 24, saw the British forces holding a new line which ran north of Peronne to Arras, and south along the banks of the river Somme to Chauny. Bapaume, Comblès and Peronne were still held firmly, but a heavy German thrust bent the line back westward at Peronne, and that place and Ham, to the south-east, were in German hands. On the next day, March 25, however, the battle at Bapaume was resumed with intense vigor, the Germans being hurled back to the east bank of the Somme, between Peronne and Liecourt, while the German drive north of Bapaume was checked. It was evident that the gigantic struggle had not reached its maximum and that strong attacks would develop. At some points it was stated that the British were outnumbered three to one.

South of La Fère lies the forest of St. Gobain, and here, it is reported, the Germans had stationed a new and heavy gun of enormous range. This weapon is said to be the first of its kind ever used in warfare, and it has a range of over 70 miles. This gun, placed in a skilfully concealed shelter, was trained on Paris, 75 miles distant, and for two days at intervals of 20 minutes the French capital was shelled. The whole city was mystified as to the source of this bombardment, which at first was attributed to some new type of airship. Not until Sunday night was the source of the projectiles discovered, and then only after long search. Although the loss of life was not large, the mystery attached to the incident powerfully stirred the people, who regarded it as a new illustration of German "frightfulness," designed to terrorize the capital. This long-range gun is said to have been built in Austria, and it was reported that each charge cost $4,000.

The Story of the Fighting

DETAILS of the great offensive, gathered from all sources, official and otherwise, form a new and thrilling chapter in the world's history. Germans who had been captured by the British toward the middle of March, set the date for the attack as near the 20th or 21st. On the 18th, neutral war correspondents were reported to have been invited to see the grand smash, and on the 21st, at 4 A. M., the guns began to pound the British trenches from the River Scarpe to La Fère. A distance of fifty miles, with a more intense envelopment of fire on the sides of the salient which the British, last November, drove into the Hindenburg line near Cambrai. Here, over a sixteen-mile front, from Lagnicourt, on the north to Gouzeaucourt on the south, the artillery battle reached an intensity never before experienced in the war, 1,000 German guns here being placed twelve yards apart.

After five hours of this the massed German troops were sent forward against the British positions. The waiting British machine-guns took a merciless toll, yet the masses came on, driven by the imperial will to force a German peace upon an outraged world. "Victory must not and will not fail us," said the Kaiser. "Clear the way to peace," said Hindenburg, and the Kaiser and von Hindenburg and von Ludendorff were watching the assault. So on they came, and the British were ready, grimly ready, hopefully ready, and glad of a chance to take the ultimate measure of the modern Hun. They swept swaths through his ranks with their machine-guns and forced him back at close quarters with knives and bayonets. At nine in the morning the field-gray masses began to flow toward the British line from Lagnicourt southward along the northern leg of the Cambria salient. At the same time, behind a smoke screen, other forces attacked the ridge running north from Gouzeaucourt. All day two vast armies were locked in deadly combat, and the fighting extended south to Hargicourt and north to Bullecourt. At the end of the day hard fighting still continued, the Germans had spent thousands of lives for a few British outpost positions and several slight penetrations into the battle positions. Maps captured on officers who were taken prisoners, showed that at no place had the enemy attained his objectives and though losing severely Haig could telegraph "The line holds."

The World's Greatest Battle

THE battle now raging in France is the greatest battle in the history of the world—greatest in number of men engaged, in power of armament, in length of front, and greatest in the issue involved.

The world war is distinctly a conflict between irreconcilable ideas, between two systems of government, two civilizations, and one or the other must go down. The policy which would make all human souls mere cogs in a vast military machine, and the policy which would make government the expression and the instrument of popular power, are contending for supremacy.

The decision may be long delayed, but the outcome cannot be doubted. Brutal Might may have its boastful day, Freedom may bleed and Civilization be shaken, but the end is not until Right has triumphed.

Our faith is not so much in the power of our armies, magnificent as they are, as in the resistless power of the righteousness of our cause. Every instinct of the civilized heart, every aspiration of the Christian soul, every promise of God to men, is a firm assurance of our eventual victory.

Not all the battling, nor the greatest part of it, falls to our brave men at the front. Upon us at home falls the sacred duty of undivided devotion, unstinting sacrifice, consecrated prayer and unfaltering faith.

THE battle raged again on the 22nd, the German troops being sent forward in three waves, followed by special shock troops, against the desperate resistance of the British. Forty divisions were identified during the two days' fighting, indicating that a total of 400,000 to 500,000 men were being kept in action by the German commanders. British airplanes flying low dealt out a merciless fire with their machine-guns, others bombed railway junctions and concentration centers and others swept back the German planes, some of which, however, were able to assist the infantry by flying above the British trenches with their machine-guns working. The artillery fire was so intense that it was heard in Dover and in Holland and even in London.

At the end of the second day, Berlin claimed the capture of the British first line, over the whole front of attack, 16,000 prisoners, and 200 guns. General Haig admitted some retirements, but announced that fierce fighting was continuing in the British battle positions. The Germans were held at Croisilles by the heroic resistance of the British 3rd Division, but penetrated southwest of Croisilles, about a mile, to St. Leger where they were stopped and driven back. About five miles further south they took the village of Doignies more than a mile west of the point of attack but here also a counter attack restored the village to British hands. As the second day closed the fighting was most intense about Croisilles and Hargicourt.

The German attack was backed by Austrian artillery, Austria being reported also to have agreed to look after the eastern front. Bulgarian troops were also said to be in reserve behind the German lines.

SATURDAY, the third day of the great offensive, opened with the British fighting in their battle-positions, roughly from three to four miles behind the advanced posts, the battle-line running from Croisilles through St. Leger, Mory, Doignies, Heudiecourt, Roisel and Roupé to the junction of the Crozat Canal and the Somme southwest of St. Quentin and north-west of La Fère. In this latter district and northward to Heudiecourt, over a front of about twenty miles, the enemy on Saturday made his greatest effort to break through and at last succeeded. Although the British held over the whole northern sector of the battle-line, the concentrations of men and guns sent westward from St. Quentin were so tremendous that the British defending troops were overwhelmed and retreat became imperative. The retreat here forced withdrawals to the northward and southward and this movement continued throughout Sunday. Sunday evening found the Germans fighting desperately for Bapaume with Peronne and the line of the Somme southward to Ham in their possession. At Ham, the battle-line crossed the Somme and passed through Chauny, some five miles southwest of La Fère, to a junction with the French near Coucy. The left wing of the French armies was also in action on Sunday, having fallen back some three or four miles to keep in touch with the British. Sunday afternoon the Germans forced crossings of the Somme south of Peronne; but General Haig reported that the troops that crossed were being dealt with.

ON Sunday, the German High Command claimed a great victory, declaring that they had defeated the British 3rd and 4th armies and parts of the Franco-American reserves. General Haig on the other hand reported the repulse of multiplied assaults over much of the line, and a continued retirement to prepared positions northward of Peronne, while the line of the Somme southward was being held.

As a part of the general "frightfulness" Paris was on Saturday and Sunday bombarded with ten-inch shells from a long range gun located somewhere in the forest of St. Gobain west of Laon. The distance between the gun and the Paris City Hall was approximately 76 miles. The shells fell in Paris intermittently at intervals of from 12 to 20 minutes throughout the two days. Ten persons were killed and fifteen or more wounded by this bombardment.

By Sunday afternoon the British had identified in the fighting ninety-seven German divisions, or approximately 1,164,000 men, about one-half of the German forces known to be available on the western front. The exact strength of the forces of defense has not been given, but at all places the British were greatly outnumbered. Only in the air were the British in the ascendancy and here, on Friday and Saturday 94 German airplanes were brought down, while on Sunday alone, 54 German machines were downed while Treves and Mannheim were bombed effectively.

At one point 100,000 Germans were thrown against 2000 yards of the front. Southwest of St. Quentin, where three British divisions had for months faced the same number of German divisions, the attack was made by eight divisions. On the front of some of the British divisions the Germans had a gun of some sort every twelve to fifteen yards, while along much of the front the men were massed at the rate of a division to a kilometer, about 12,000 men to $\frac{5}{8}$ of a mile. Never in the history of man has such a concentration of men and guns been made or such an attack launched. Never has such a price in blood been paid for such a measure of victory.

THE British held their ground, mowing down assault after assault, until their own ranks were too depleted for further resistance. They then fell back, foot by foot, to new positions where the same thing was done over again. Correspondents reported the retirements as made in good order, with heroic rear-guard actions covering each withdrawal. In general, the British were able to withdraw their guns, the captures of the Germans being made largely on the first day. Following a torrent of explosives and bursting metal, the Germans advanced in masses, shoulder to shoulder; gaps made by machine-guns and shrapnel were filled as fast as made, and the standing wire was cut by hand as the machine-guns ate into the field-gray masses. But there were more men in the assault than any condensation of fire could kill or stop, and the fighting almost everywhere came to close quarters. The assaulting troops came forward, two companies in line, with light machine-guns, followed by more machine gun companies, followed again by other assault troops and still more machine-gun companies, the intervals between the assaulting waves being about 100 yards. Then, 200 yards back of these, came the trench mortars and then the field artillery, which kept close on the heels of the advancing infantry, and finally, in some places, the Uhlan cavalry. The artillery bombardment extended to a depth of over five miles behind the lines attacked.

The Supreme Hour of History

WE ARE living in a period of war the most awful and eventful in the history of mankind. Our country has taken her place in the great conflict, and Americans are living in hope of a victory that will assure peace hereafter. Wealth, suffering, misery, devastation—life itself—may be the cost, but the victory of a righteous peace will make all mankind satisfied. It will be a glorious climax to millenniums of struggle. If it overthrows thrones and establishes the rights of the common people, it will be the achievement of the ages. If it breaks down the barriers of division between churches in the great family of God, making them a unit before all the forces of evil, instead of battling against each other, our Lord's prayer will be answered, "that they all may be one."

If the war shall inspire the youth of the world to live for high principles instead of pleasure, for grand endeavor instead of ease, for righteousness instead of ruin, for others rather than self, then the young manhood of our nation will find its soul and come out of the furnace of war without the smell of evil upon its garments. In the way of the Cross, we do not throw ourselves away. We lose life to save it. Give yourself away and return to yourself, enriched, redeemed, glorious!

What a privilege, then, to live in this supreme crisis of all history, to help prepare the way of the Lord for his universal reign of righteousness among all kindreds, peoples and tongues. After the struggle there will be a resurrection of principle. Already hearts are burning anew with the truth of heaven and the hope of evil's overthrow. They know that "God is still in his world," and that out of this crucifixion of the nations will arise the spirit of Christian liberty. May we choose the way to the heights through suffering.

Secretary Baker at the Front

SECRETARY BAKER took the country by surprise when he visited the battle-front in France. That trip was one of the best things he has yet devised. He went there that he might see for himself what our great American army is doing, and the results of his observations as cabled home have not only given widespread satisfaction, but they have intensified the American war spirit as nothing else could possibly have done. We can readily believe him when he writes that he has had the busiest time of his life, and that he feels that he will be a better War Secretary for the experience.

What he saw went far beyond what he had ever imagined. All the preparations of the American forces he found on a scale of vastness of which he did not dream. He found evidence everywhere that the great appropriations for the war were being wisely spent. He tells of inspecting gigantic supply depots and storage warehouses, great airdromes with innumerable hangars to accommodate the thousands of aircraft which will soon control the situation overhead. He saw splendidly equipped hospitals, enormous training camps, with miles upon miles of railway tracks and great lines of locomotives, giving quickest communication for troops and guns, and which would be sufficient to accommodate the great host of American fighters yet to come.

But he saw more. He has seen our gunners along what he felicitously calls "the Frontier of Freedom," pounding the Germans with Yankee shells with deadly accuracy, battering their gas machines into junk, and capturing their trenches as though it were an ordinary everyday occurrence. And he has come in contact with the spirit of our men and is assured that, man to man and gun to gun, they can more than hold their own.

All of this and more has inspired the War Secretary with a greater confidence than ever. His terse, clear-cut picture of the situation at the front, where our brave troops are nearer to the German border than any others on the long Allied lines, should spur the American people to "speed up" their work of preparation. Our war industries should be inspired to redouble their efforts. Every true heart should work with multiplied energy to put a mighty fleet on the seas—to make, as someone has expressed it, "a bridge of boats to Europe"—over which men, munitions, supplies and everything needful could pass in such a mighty stream as would meet every possible want. Our munition makers, our aircraft builders, our Liberty motor constructors, seeing the great opportunity and appreciating the need of haste, should now strive by every means to increase their product. If we do this, the crisis of the war will soon be reached and victory will be in sight.

Secretary Baker tells us that our whole army abroad is fired with courage and patriotism and is confident of success. Our men look to the workers at home to put on the steam and make their mightiest effort this spring to supply all the needs of the forces in the field. And our citizens can aid magnificently in this by subscribing liberally to the new Liberty Loan now about to be launched, so that it may go clean "over the top."

That the magnitude of America's preparations is not overlooked by Germany may be gathered from the tone of the Teutonic press. The Muenchener Neuste Nachrichten of recent date discusses the advisability of another peace effort by Germany and Austria, and says: "If agreement with America could succeed before its war machinery assumes irresistible momentum, the whole Entente will be unhinged." But neither peace notes nor delays will change America's attitude on the western front, for in all probability it is there that the great conflict must ultimately be decided which will restore peace to the world and assure democracy to its peoples.

The New Day

TURNING the hands of the clock an hour forward is in itself a simple thing; it does not alter the time a minute nor hasten or retard by a single second the earth in its whirl upon its axis or in its sweep around its orbit.

It changes nothing but our own standard of measurement—but which, it happens, is the main thing in our lives, mental, moral and spiritual. Upon our standards of measurement depend all our seeing, thinking, doing, aspiring. The whole material world, as well as the spiritual, is to each of us according to his standard of measurement.

Though the length of the day is not changed toward us by our change of standard we are thereby changed toward it. To us the same old day becomes a longer and brighter day. We greet it in earlier freshness and complete our labors in the fulness of its glory, and its lingering twilight gently ushers us into the sweet shades of well-earned rest. A day is an epitome of a lifetime; according to one's standards of measurement he embraces its opportunities, chooses and performs its tasks, and achieves the fulfillment of its promises. According to his standards are the brightness of the dawning, the zest of his work, the usefulness of his day, and the splendor of the sunset.

The change in the clock is not the only change in our standards as a people. We have gained a new vision of life which embraces the struggling, the oppressed and enslaved of all the earth. We thrill with a new meaning of liberty and gird ourselves more firmly for the fight to maintain its responsibilities and extend its blessings, at whatever cost of life and treasure. Because of new standards our national life is larger and fuller to us, just as our day is longer and brighter. America fills a bigger place in the world today, has wider vision, longer reach, and higher mission. It fills too big a place for autoeracy, force and oppression to exist in the same world with it. Our glorious nation aroused has set standards not only for ourselves but for all that love liberty.

The New Liberty Loan

THE ruthless aggressions of the invading Teutonic forces in Russia make our own purpose and task in the great war more and more clear to us, while daily reports of the heroic conduct of our boys in France and of casualties among them bring the war close home. Fast developing events convince beyond any cavil that America is not only rightly and irrevocably in the war, but also destined to bear the great burden of it and to force its decision.

We are in the war to win it. We are waging it for no selfish purpose, for no aggrandizement, but for a righteous peace which will be a blessing to all the peoples of the world. We will wage it patriotically and persistently until we have fought it through and won it according to the highest ideals and noblest traditions of our country.

The present business of the United States is war—war to exterminate autoeracy and unrighteousness and to establish peace and justice among the nations of the world.

The President has stated that the war can be won only if all the people of the country unite in the common purpose. No one group of people, or two groups, or three groups, can win the war. It can only be won by the united and continuous cooperation of every man, woman and child.

The third Liberty Loan, soon to be launched, will undoubtedly exceed in amount not only its two predecessors, but any single war loan ever offered. Its success is assured if the entire nation responds to the offering and every citizen prides himself on patriotic self-denial, that he may subscribe to the limit of his ability. We have all got to get behind the government, which is devoting its entire energies to waging a great warfare for freedom. This warfare requires putting men in the field and keeping them fed and clothed. It requires the production of ships and shells, guns and rifles, motor trucks, horses, saddlery, aeroplanes, hospital supplies, food and a great variety of goods, the production of which calls for vast industrial plants from one end of the country to the other, manned by millions of men and women who serve their country as effectively as our soldiers and sailors.

If the American people continue to require all the pleasant and comfortable luxuries which they consumed before the war, they are making it necessary for these thousands of factories and shops, employing millions of men and women, to produce articles which do not help to bring peace a day nearer, when they might be devoting themselves to the production of the necessary things which will help to bring the war to a victorious conclusion.

Both things cannot go on together. We have pledged the honor of our country and our people to fight this war to our last dollar and to our last man, if necessary. America does not break her word.

As a united people, consecrated to the great task which lies before us, we cannot fail. There must be no division of opinion, no slackness of purpose, no holding back. We confront a condition that is all-compelling; we aim at a purpose that is all-inspiring.

Stamping Out the Spies

RUSSIA was ruined by German spies who, long before the beginning of the war, were working insidiously throughout the Czar's empire. The whole nation was honeycombed with them, and when the crisis came, the millions who should have stood up unitedly for the defense of a free and independent Russia, crumbled because of treason and went ignominiously to pieces. Scarcely less extensive has been the German spy system in America. Under the skilful control of Von Bernstorff, by whom it was largely financed, it seems to have threaded the country to an extent that has hardly yet come fully to light. The arrest of Mme. Storch, political spy and adventuress, with her associates, Mme. Nix and "Baron" de Beville, and their treasonable plottings, furnishes a case in point. They are all shown to have been in the pay of Germany and to have had associates both here and abroad with whom they were in treasonable communication. They will probably be sent to France to be dealt with by the authorities there, who will doubtless give them their due.

It is a time for sifting out the dangerous element who persist in plotting against this Republic. With a great war on our hands, we cannot dally with treason, hidden or overt. Our eyes are open, and we will not tolerate in our midst the circulation of the secret poison which sapped the life of Russia, and brought ruin on a brave people who deserved a better fate.

Send in Your Suggestions

MANY readers of the Christian Herald will welcome the news that Marion Harland, who for a number of years was one of our most valued contributors, has returned to the fold of our Family Circle, and that articles from her pen will appear regularly in these columns every week. Marion Harland will have special charge of a Department dealing with household problems, more particularly those that relate to the economic and healthful feeding of the family in war-time. In countless thousands of American homes this is a burning question today. Marion Harland probably knows more about kitchen difficulties and the best ways and means of dealing with them, than any other woman in America today. She will invite the housewives belonging to our Family Circle and their friends to tell her their difficulties, and will give them the aid of her long experience to help overcome them.

Now we wish to ask a favor of our readers: Won't the ladies put on their thinking-caps and tell us just what they think would be the most appropriate title for Marion Harland's new Department? It must be simple, of course. It need not be more than three or four words—at most not over five. So we now cordially invite all of the ladies of our Family Circle to join in this helpful service to their favorite family journal, and send us on postals their suggestions for a title. To those who suggest the most appropriate, we will gladly send our best acknowledgments and give them a leading place on the Roll of Honor besides.

On the Frontier of Freedom

SECRETARY OF WAR BAKER used this happy phrase as he stood beside a Sammy in a listening-post, from which he looked across No Man's Land at the German barbed wire and the piled-up parapets of the enemy's trenches while shells whistled overhead. Following conferences in Paris Secretary Baker inspected every detail of the American expedition, from the ports of debarkation to the warehouses behind the front, the communications, the aviation fields, the rest stations and hospitals, even the whole tortuous length of the front line of the American sector; for Secretary Baker before he went expressed the opinion that he would return a better Secretary of War, and he omitted nothing in the way of instruction that might yield him necessary knowledge.

On March 19, he entered the zone of fire in the automobile of the general commanding the division. The Secretary wore a trench coat, khaki breeches, a colonel's boots, and a shrapnel helmet. He carried a gas mask, in the use of which he had been drilled. As the party was entering the trench system a sentry demanded the pass. "Division Commander and Secretary of War," replied the general, to the confusion of the sentinel.

Mr. Baker displayed the keenest curiosity, asking an explanation of every unfamiliar thing, its purpose and use, and particularly showing familiarity with military technicalities which could only have been gained by careful study. He was interested in the caliber of the shells bursting nearby, and he recognized the rattle of a machine-gun, when a watchful American prepared a reception for a too-daring German. The sector which Mr. Baker inspected was being held by the Rainbow Division, several of whose officers and men had already received the French War Cross for valiant action. Some of the troops were from Ohio. Several men were known personally to Mr. Baker. With these he talked about their homes and families. The Secretary was greatly pleased when told in answer to a question that the American shooting was much better than that of the enemy. He entered the dugouts, made his way along the muddy trenches on the duck boards and stopped on his way back at a little roadside cemetery where, under the waving tricolor, itself red, white and blue, lay the bodies of the first American soldiers who died in that section for France and the freedom of democracy. Visiting a hospital he met a wounded man who said he had been granted the French War Cross, but did not wear it because of the American army regulations, and Mr. Baker replied, "I now give you authority to do so." To the Forty-second, or Rainbow Division, which so peculiarly represents all of America, the Secretary paid a high tribute for military efficiency. "I thought," he said, "you marched well when I last saw you" (the Secretary reviewed the division before it sailed), "but what I have seen of you today gives me a new standard of comparison. . . . I feel that you have all grown to better manhood, and that the steel of your spirit now has the fighting edge. . . . Your own communities and the nation as a whole may be proud of your good conduct and clean life, which go with clean hard fighting and the principles for which you fight."

During the week American artillery has held the upper hand of the German guns. On the 18th a very annoying battery of trench mortars was located after much difficulty and put out of action by high explosive shells. On the following day gas and explosive shells silenced German 37 millimeter guns which were firing from the cemetery at Riebecourt. The gunners were driven out of the position. American trench raiders fought hand to hand with the enemy on March 20, after penetrating his positions east of Luneville, where his first and second line trenches were destroyed by American artillery fire. On this front, on March 22, several Germans surrendered to the Americans.

An American cruiser in the Pacific, on March 19, captured a small German sea raider, the Alexander Agassiz, which had been fitted up at a Mexican port, from which it had just sailed. The Agassiz was heavily armed but too small for active sea raiding. It was surmised that the crew expected to capture a larger vessel, which might be better suited to their purpose.

Secretary Baker concluded his trip to the war zone on March 20, with a visit to Verdun, a call at Great Headquarters, a visit to Domremy, the birth

Ordnance has equipped 16 large plants for the manufacture of mobile artillery and plans a total expenditure of $2,000,000,000. Great mobile machine shops, mounted on auto trucks are also to be supplied to the forces abroad so that necessary repairs to damaged guns may be made almost on the spot.

The American Y. M. C. A., on March 24, had 1600 persons, 300 of them women, in France, at work at the front, behind the lines, in camps and in cities and towns. Some of the 500 recreation centers under their care are in

Lord of the British Admiralty, on March 20 told the House of Commons just where the Allied nations stood in the matter of tonnage. He also announced the appointment of Lord Pierrie, Britain's foremost shipbuilder, as Controller General of Merchant Ship Building. According to Sir Eric the world's net tonnage, exclusive of enemy ships, had fallen 2,632,297 tons since the beginning of the war, and now stood at about 42,000,000 tons. The loss of tonnage from all causes in 1917 was about 6,000,000 tons. This has been partly made good by new construction and by the seizing of enemy ships in American and Brazilian ports. In the last quarter of 1917, 1,200,000 tons were destroyed, 420,000 tons were built in Britain and 512,000 tons elsewhere in Allied and neutral yards, making a total of 932,000 tons, and showing a net loss of 268,000 tons. Great Britain at present has 47 shipyards, with 209 berths, engaged on ocean-going merchant vessels. An increase by 80 per cent. of necessary repairs to naval craft had kept busy forces of men which might have produced 500,000 tons of merchant ships. During February 2,500 additional men were set to work in the yards and shortages of material were made good. Sir Eric declared that it was necessary, now that the destruction by the submarines was held at a small figure, to increase production only 100,000 tons a month in order to overtake the present rate of loss. The Dutch ships taken over by the United States and Great Britain on March 20 added a million tons to available shipping, more than counterbalancing the deficit in construction in favor of the U-boat during the last three months. Seventeen British ships, eleven of 1,600 tons or over and six below that figure were lost during the past week. France lost one ship of over 1,600 tons and two of smaller tonnage. Two more Spanish ships have been torpedoed.

The war trade board, on March 22, issued new regulations governing imports into the United States by which the importation of a long list of non-essential articles was placed under drastic regulations. It was expected thus to release 350,000 tons of shipping for more necessary carrying.

An agreement with Japan, consummated on March 20, also provided for the delivery to the United States, in exchange for American steel, of 150,000 tons of merchant ships. President Wilson, in explaining the action regarding the Dutch ships, declared that Holland was under duress and was left without free will, being unable because of German threats to consummate the agreement for the use of her shipping in the service of the Allies and the interest of her own well-being. The government and press of Holland were reported as very bitter against Great Britain and the United States because of the seizing of the ships, and Germany was reported as threatening to throw a submarine blockade around Holland to prevent any more of her ships from going to sea.

The first commandeered Dutch ship to hoist the American flag sailed, on March 23, from an Atlantic port on a voyage to South America.

On March 24 there were 230,000 men building ships in American yards and arrangements were afoot for the employment of 150,000 more within six months.

ANOTHER "SCRAP OF PAPER." In spite of the signing of the peace treaty with Russia, German troops have continued the invasion of that distracted land. On March 20 the occupation of Petrograd by the Germans was felt to be only a matter of hours, the Germans being only 150 miles south of Petrograd and there being no sign of any organized resistance. The German troops were also advancing in southern Russia being only five hours' march from Kherson, which they took on the 21st, while a movement against

Over the Top

WE have heard of sermons from stones, but for next week's stirring message, "Over the Top with the Stars of God," Dr. A. E. Keigwin, one of New York City's Christian leaders, takes his text from the service flag.

Frank Carpenter has turned his inquiring mind toward the munition factories. He found out a lot about shrapnel and shells, and the skill of women in delicate mechanical processes. You'll know as much as he when you have read next week's Herald.

Then there is the Hostess House at the cantonment. We have sought a real human story that would show the inner life of these places where the military life and the home life meet. It will appear next week.

Next week, too, a double page of pictures in Rotogravure, another meeting of the neighbors, and the third chapter of "The Measure of a Man," in which Harley at last meets Janet alone.

Costly Living and Cheap Religion

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—II Sam. 7:2. "The king said unto Nathan the prophet, See now, I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth in curtains."

THIS is a most striking contrast to which the great king had just awakened. He himself was dwelling in a house which, in splendid proportions and completeness of equipment, was the glory of the land. But the house in which the ark of the Lord was resting was a frail, shifting, precarious tent of the fields. The selfward side of life expressed itself in cedars; the Godward side of life enshrined itself in curtains. The selfward side was costly, the Godward side was cheap. That which directly related to the eternal interests was tabernacled in common linen; the worldly interests were clothed in silver and gold. The contrast is just that of expensive living and a cheap religion.

Now, this old-world contrast suggests many lines of fruitful meditation which are pertinent to our modern life. This is very evident in the contrast which prevails between the nature of our homes and the character of many of our churches. The one is symbolized by the cedar and the other by the curtain. To the one we give our best, and to the other the second best. In music and in art, we demand the excellent for our homes; but we are often contented with the commonplace in the house of God. And, truth to say, many people so consistently relegate the secondary to their church, that they have come to attach almost a sacred value to the common and the unimpressive, and to regard it as specially hallowed and sanctified. They have made a grace of the ugly, and a virtue of the imperfect and incomplete.

It is evident that the contrast also prevails between our domestic ardor and our civic apathy and indifference. We insist upon our domestic affairs being well managed and orderly, inviting and nourishing, while civic affairs go unheeded and are allowed to persist as best they may. Homeward we are intense; cityward we are lax and loose. Homeward we are ardent; cityward we are lukewarm and cool. There is order at home; but riot may run unheeded in the next street.

AND certainly the contrast prevails between our home-enthusiasm and the lukewarmness of our ministries to the foreign field. It is certainly true that we dwell in a house of cedar. The religious privileges into which we are born are rich and bountiful. Ours is the knowledge of the secret of eternal life and light and hope. Our liberties are airy and roomy, and our feet stand in a large place. Yes, ours is "a house of cedar," a strong house, "a house of defense to dwell in." But beyond the homeland, privilege is scanty and liberties are few. Fear and superstition are rampant, and religious life trembles in a very fragile and uncertain tent. In the rude tempests of life, the heart is stilled and stricken with fear, and the tent-pegs are often tugged from their holdings. It is the old contrast.

But it is not along these lines that I want to place the emphasis of our lesson today. I want to observe the more particular bearing of the text upon the selfward and Godward side of the individual life. There are multitudes of men who put their best into the selfward side of life. Amid the alternatives of major and minor purposes it is the major which is impoverished. The Godward side is the cheap side. On the self side they take infinite pains; on the Godward side anything will do.

HERE, then, is a very certain standard of judgment. How much do we invest on the Godward side? Our religion is valuable, and comes to be valued according to what we spend upon it. That is true even on the lowest planes of life. We value a thing in proportion to the money we pay for it; but it is also true on the higher place. Liberty was infinitely precious to our fathers, because it bore the marks of sacrifice. It was crimsoned with the red stain of their own blood. We are inclined to hold our liberties cheaply because they cost us nothing.

It is even so with the highest ministries of religion itself. If we give our religion "the leavings"—the leavings of our time and strength—then our religion will become a thing "left." If we give it our best, it will rear itself as the most exalted presence in our life.

Well, then, how much have we invested on the Godward side? Have we invested only as much as would purchase a curtain, or have we secured the strength of cedars? How much capital have we sunk in the cause of the Kingdom? I am not using the word "capital" in the poor and paltry sense of money. Money, after all, is the poorest stuff in our locker. There is finer capital than that in our inheritance, and how much of this have we expended on the diviner side of our life? Let the question be made more pertinent still.

How much energy of thought do we invest on the Godward side? Try to realize the vast expenditure of thought in other realms. Think how much thought is invested in the getting of money, and in the pursuit of carnal pleasure, and in the quest of knowledge and of wisdom. And think, too, of the amazing ingenuity employed in the quest. Men are busy inventing all sorts of contrivances to make these things their own possession. And then turn from all these to the Godward aspect of human life! Is it not like passing from a strong cedar to a frail curtain, from a tenacious fiber to a brittle thread? How little thought men give to their religion!

I am not now speaking of the mere study of theology, but of the quest of a godly life. Many a man delights in theological subtleties who is engaged in no commanding crusade for the nobilities of a sanctified life. It is of the higher quest that I now speak, and I declare that there are multitudes of men who invest vast stores of thought-capital in the realms I have named, but little or next to nothing in the quest of goodness and holy fellowship and nearness of intimacy with their God. What we need in our day is a revision of our investments and a more lavish expenditure of thought on the Godward side of it.

AND let me ask again, how much will-power do we expend on the God-side? Does the contrast find expression in the old symbolism of cedar and curtain? Take one side of a man's life: his will pounds away like a powerful motor. Take another side; his will is as weak and forceless as an anæmic pulse. On one side his energy is like a mill-stream; on the other, the energy trickles like a rivulet in time of drought.

This is a most extraordinary phenomenon in human life. There is one room in our life where there is engine-power enough for anything; in another room there is not enough power to give birth to even a sluggish motion. Particularly is this manifest in the selfward and the Godward side of life. We grasp business, but we only tickle religion. And so the Godward side of really strong men hangs loose and limp as a curtain, while these business relationships are strong as cedars. The explanation of many a religious failure is "want of capital." Men need to invest more "will" in the realm of their religion. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God . . . with all thy strength." "Bring unto the Lord glory and strength." It is needful to put as much will-power in the quest of godliness as in the pursuit of wealth.

AND lastly, how much of sacrifice have we on the Godward side? What is the extent of our contribution to the general cause of the Kingdom? Is it niggardly or bountiful? Does it find a fitting symbol in the costly cedar or in the tawdry curtain? What is our offering in the matter of time? There are many people who will give money to the Kingdom, but who refuse the costlier gift of time. They want all their time for their business and their pleasures. These realms shall have the cedar, the other realm may have the curtain.

And what do we give in the matter of sympathy? I am not referring to thin, diluted, bloodless sentimentality, but sympathy with passion at its heart, sympathy pulsing with pang and pain. Do we make any contribution of this kind, or is our sympathy the nerveless process in which there is no blood transaction, and in which the heart remains unbroken? Is our sympathy cheap, or is it red with costly sacrifice?

All these are searching questions, which each man may apply to his own heart. We know where the capital power of our life is primarily invested and we know what is the extent of our speculation in the Kingdom of our God. Let every man take the inquiry into his own spirit and answer it in the secret place of the Most High.

He Giveth Rest

WHAT though the Eden morn was sweet with song
Passing all sweetness that our thought can reach?
Gilding its flowers Noon's chariot moved along
In brightness far transcending mortal speech.
Yet in the evening shade did God draw near;
Oh, welcome, sorrow, so that He appear!

Prosperity is flushed with papal ease.
Granting indulgences to pride of word,
Clothing our soul in pomp and vanities.
Ah! no fit dwelling for our gentle Lord!
Grief rends those draperies of pride and sin.
And so our Lord will deign to enter in.

Then carefully we curb each thought of wrong,
We walk more softly, with more reverent feet,
As in his presence-chamber hush our tongue
And in the holy solemn quiet sweet
We feel his smile, we hear his voice so low,
And we can bless him that he gave us woe.

What cares the sailor in the sheltered cove
For the past perils of the stormy sea?
Dear from grief's storm the haven of his love.
And so he bringeth us where we would be.
We trust in him, we lean upon his breast;
Who shall make trouble when he giveth rest.

The Troubled Heart

SUNDAY, April 7. John 14:27. "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." Whenever Ian Maclaren was called to a house of sickness or sorrow he always read to the troubled folk the fourteenth chapter of John. Nothing was ever used as a substitute for this. "If one is sinking into unconsciousness," he said, "and you read 'In my Father's house are many mansions' he will come back and whisper 'mansions,' and he will wait till you finish, 'where I am there ye shall be also,' before he dies in peace." In such critical hours there is something so vital, so satisfying, so pacifying in our Saviour's assurances of God and his wonderful preparations of redemption.

But it is not only in the last crisis of the great translation that we need the fourteenth chapter of John. There are sore convulsions in life when death is far away, and we sometimes wish it were near. Death might solve our troubles; life itself is the problem. We have suffered some heavy shock. Our circumstances are all upheaved. Familiar landmarks have been removed. We have lost our bearings.

What is to be our resource in these troubled hours? Our Lord calls us to hold to one Center, and to one only. If we get away from that Center everything else will be erratic and eccentric. If we abide there everything will take its appropriate place. "Believe in God, believe also in me!" We are to trust the Father as unveiled to us in Jesus Christ his Son. We are to fling ourselves, with all our weight of care and sorrow, upon his loyal and loving strength. We are to hold there, nay, to rest there, and the troubled incidents will begin to arrange themselves in divinely purposed ranks. If Christ be lifted up he will draw even these convulsive happenings into destined and friendly order. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid. J. H. J.

Lest We Forget

MONDAY, April 8. Ps. 90:12. "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." Time is a part of eternity. If we are in eternity now, and we are, it is very easy to see that the character of eternity depends upon our use of time. Today is the only hold we have upon eternity. This hour is a little fragment of eternity. So, eternal issues flow out of our actions now. When shall we ever learn the value of time? A great English scientist who never willingly wasted an hour said, "He who wastes so much as an hour of time has no proper sense of the value of life." The career of every notable man or woman in the world is marked by this characteristic if not explained by it—a keen sense of the value of time.

There is the story of a king, who, unlike most kings, was distinguished for his philosophic view of life. He said, "I count that day lost in which I have done no good thing." We may count that day lost which does not add to our knowledge of God and of his Word, the knowledge of God's habits and his thoughts.

That day is lost which leaves no record of word of praise, no prayer of thanks, no thought of gratitude to God.

What is true of prayer is true of praise, that he who prays but rarely, prays not at all. Prayer and praise are not occasional notes in the organ of life, but pipes in the organ, absence of which means serious loss to the music, discord instead of harmony. Here and now we are to work out what God has wrought in us by his Holy Spirit, the passion for goodness and the quest for truth. Only as we redeem the time do we prove ourselves worthy the great redemption. C. C. A.

Testifying to Truth

TUESDAY, April 9. III John 3, 4. "I rejoiced greatly, when the brethren came and testified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest in the truth. I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in truth." The task of a teacher of Christian truth in a world that lies in wickedness is so arduous, his disappointments are so many, that his successes become to him, indeed, occasions of a great heartfelt joy. He rejoices with the angels in heaven when he has succeeded in inducing a hearer to accept the truth that saves. Still greater is his joy when he observes that the good beginning in grace is followed by a conduct worthy of the Gospel of Jesus. It is the joy of a spiritual father who has begotten a child by the word of truth and then watches the splendid development of the child. In the realm of divine grace, greater joy, indeed there cannot be.

In the present instance the joy of John over the exemplary conduct of his ward Gaius was increased, because others had reported to him how well the work of grace which John had begun in Gaius had been prospered. Gaius had been honored by having John for his teacher. Now the teacher is, in turn, honored by his apt pupil, and the teacher's instruction is publicly commended to men by the excellent results which it has achieved in the pupil. Instances of this kind are not as rare in the church as one might think; they are only not observed as frequently as they should be, nor is the lesson which they convey always made as prominent as it might be. Every well-trained Christian is such a rich compensation for a teacher's labors, that every teacher will acknowledge with profound gratitude to the Head of the Church, that it overcomes all the fruitless toil in his ministry, all the vexations, the opposition, persecution and mockery to which he found himself exposed. W. H. T. D.

Faith Triumphant

WEDNESDAY April 10. Matt. 15:28. "O woman, great is thy faith." Faith is the key to secular, as well as spiritual life. Christ says, "I am the door." The key of faith will always open the door into Christ's kingdom. The door of opportunity has been opened and nature's wonders revealed by such men as Columbus, Newton, Franklin, and Edison using this key of faith. Faith is the victory that overcomes the world. Without faith it is impossible to please God and to save men. Unbelief is the paralysis of the soul hindering every movement towards truth and righteousness. Faith is the golden link connecting with the eternal throne of God.

The Syro-Phoenician woman's faith was especially distinguished because she persisted in believing notwithstanding the silence of the Master, who spoke not a word of reply. Falling at His feet, she cried still louder for mercy for her afflicted child. The more the disciples said "Send her away," the stronger was her determination to stay. At last, when Christ put the sublime test to her great faith, saying, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and give it unto dogs," she, accepting the humble position of a dog, cried out in piteous appeal, "Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat the crumbs which fall from the Master's table." Then Christ's heart of compassion burst its bounds as he exclaimed, with matchless tenderness, "O woman, great is thy faith," and her daughter was made whole from that very hour. E. W. C.

The Beauty of Humility

THURSDAY, April 11. Rom. 12:3. "I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think." There is nothing which more obstructs the will of God in the lives of some of us than our foolish and wicked pride, our self-centeredness, our insistence upon our own views, wishes, preferences, dignities, rights. Not only America, but all the world, reveres the memory of Abraham Lincoln. There was a man who reached the summit of earthly fame, but who never allowed personal ambition to stand in the way of his largest usefulness to the world. That he was ambitious there can be no doubt. He valued the good opinion of others, but never for praise did he forsake the path of duty. Never did he allow the mere possession of power to make him a tyrant. He had the saving grace of humility. Humble he was, yet never so strong, so high, so worthy of fellowship with immortals, as when he made least of his rights and dignities. Herein most statesmen fail. Napoleon sought crowns for himself, his brothers and his favorites. Such ambition defeats its own end.

The most powerful figure in Europe today is a king without a capital, a man who lives in the trenches with his own homeless and exiled soldiers. The most powerful figures of history have been men who gave up thrones, rather than men who grasped them. The King of all history is One who left his throne, who put on the garments of human flesh in order that all of us might be kings and priests unto God, his Father and ours. C. C. A.

True Well-Wishing

FRIDAY, April 12. III John 2. "Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth." Regard for the earthly welfare and physical health of our acquaintances is considered a mark of good breeding even among worldly men. Solicitous inquiries regarding these matters may be nothing but a form of politeness. Among Christians even these seemingly trivial matters are spiritualized.

The principle of brotherly love which regulates the entire conduct of Christians embraces also concern for the secular prosperity of our brethren. We are to rejoice with them that do rejoice; their good fortune, success, advancement, personal well-being is to be a cause of rejoicing to us. For have we not prayed that God might bestow these very things upon our brethren? Our acknowledgment of their happiness, accordingly, is virtually an expression of our satisfaction that our prayer has been heard.

Our wishing health and prosperity to them, when we meet them or write letters to them, as John did to Gaius, is an assurance to them that our cordial interest in them as brethren in our common faith is still alive and active, and prompts us to connect them habitually with the great primary Source whence all good gifts and all perfect gifts descend to men, the Father of lights and his Son Jesus Christ.

When Christians voice sentiments like those in our text, they do not merely exchange conventional courtesies, but bind the ties which connect them in a Christian brotherhood more firmly, and are mutually benefited by the kind wishes they express for one another, because the Lord Jesus blesses such wishes.

But there is a reminder here that a person's health may be of two kinds. We do not consider it unbecoming to inquire after a person's physical health, but to inquire after the health of his soul is frequently considered quite improper. Why should it be? Is not the sound condition of the soul of much greater importance to a person? Let us not wait until our friends and acquaintances are sick before we speak to them about their spiritual interests, the grace of the Lord Jesus, the infallible truth of God's word, implicit confidence in the promises of Scripture, but let us make these matters occasionally topics of conversation with them when they are in the best of health. Songs Amid Sorrow

SATURDAY, April 13. Matt. 10:29. "Not one sparrow shall fall to the ground without your Father." It is said that just before the batteries opened fire at the battle of Gettysburg, an officer noticed a mother bird sitting beside her nest pouring forth a flood of song. Then the long day through, the cannon roared and the shell shrieked and the cries of wounded men were everywhere, but in the moments of occasional cessation from firing, the officer saw that the little bird took up its song. So it is that the children of God are given songs in the night of conflict and agony.

Once, a bird's nest was seen on a slender limb, hanging over the mighty Niagara. There the bird nested and sang amid the roar of the cataract, as joyous as though far away from danger. The birds do not worry about being protected amidst terrors, being fed in hunger, housed in storms or hanging over precipices of danger. They sing on, in beautiful faith and trust. Our Lord uses them as an illustration of what our faith should be. We should consider the birds, for they have neither storehouses nor barns, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. How much better are ye than the fowls of the air?

The birds come and go, but we go forever. Should we not sing in the evening time with the robins, "He giveth His beloved sleep," and rise with the lark in the morning, chanting, "When I am awake, I am still with Thee"? The whole round world was created for us, with all its animal life; therefore we should not doubt God's providence. He that careth for the sparrow will watch over his children. We certainly need his providential care, for our journey is through deserts of drought, valleys of sorrow, perils of enemies. E. W. C.

The Measure of a Man

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ
Author of "The Witness"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING INSTALMENT

JANET GRAYSON and Harley Bruce had grown up as playmates and school comrades in the village of Springdale until Harley left for college. When on his return he called at the Grayson house, he was accompanied by Lotta Lomond, whose appearance and manners were in marked contrast to the simplicity of the village girl. Harley took the girls out for a spin in his car, in which they were accompanied by Thaddeus Wiltrone, a worldly-wise young friend of Lotta's. The company proved so uncongenial to Janet that she sought some means of escape.

LEANING close to Harley, so the others did not hear, Janet said, "Harley, please, would you just as soon stop at Aunt Nan's for a minute? I'd like to speak to her."

"Sure!" said Harley, sweeping her a look and smile out of his grouch, and in a second more the car came to a stand-still before the little white house, and Harley was helping Janet out.

"I'm going to manage to get you on the front seat beside me on the way back," growled Harley in a low tone as he opened the gate for her. She cast him a look of gratitude, but flew up the walk as if her feet had wings.

She swept like a young storm up to the porch of the little white house where Aunt Nan was enjoying the afternoon sun as she worked.

"Aunt Nan, you want me to help you very much right away! Say you want me, and you can't do without me! Say it quick, please, Auntie."

"Why, surely, child, I always want you," said the astonished lady, looking up from the cherries she was stoning. "I'm making preserves, and I would be delighted to have your help. Certainly I must have you right away! What in the world is the matter, Janet?"

But Janet had flown out to the gate again.

"I'm very sorry to disappoint you, Harley," she said demurely, "but I find Aunt Nan needs me this afternoon. I'm sure you'll excuse me, and I hope you'll have a very pleasant ride."

She turned with the last word and fled back to the house, for she saw by the mutiny in Harley's face that he would not let her go without protest. But on the porch she turned and waved her hand.

"We're going to stop by for you on our way back!" called Harley, "You stay here till we come for you! We won't be later than five!"

But Janet only waved a graceful little hand.

CHAPTER II

JANET enveloped her pretty dress in one of her aunt's long gingham aprons and stoned cherries as if her very life depended on it.

"It was just a motor party, aunty," she explained, "and I didn't fit, that was all; I had to have some excuse to get away."

"Who were they?" asked her aunt, studying the girl's sweet face understandingly. "Anybody I know?"

"Just a noisy set that Mrs. Bruce has brought down from New York," answered Janet evasively.

Her aunt swept her another keen glance.

"Has Harley come back?" she asked after a moment.

"Yes, he got here last night," answered Janet coolly. "But I've scarcely seen him yet. He seems to be rather tied up at home. He came over this morning to ask me to go this afternoon, but I haven't had a real good look at him alone yet, so I'm not sure whether he's the old Harley or not. Aunt Nan, do you want me to empty this bowl into the kettle for you? It's getting rather too full, isn't it?"

Aunt Nan was wise. She said no more. She knew Janet did not wish to talk about Harley, but she watched her niece keenly, and now and then a look of deep satisfaction and relief floated over her face.

with wild flowers; about her mother and the pretty white dimities she had at last consented to wear instead of black and white as had been her custom; about anything but Harley Bruce and the motor party from which she had escaped.

Aunt Nan wisely followed her lead and said nothing more about Harley Bruce, although she could think of nothing else.

The cherries flew from the basket into the big yellow bowls under the white fingers of Janet, and what her aunt had expected to be an afternoon's task was soon over.

Janet glanced hurriedly at the clock. It was only three o'clock. No danger yet.

"Now, Aunt Nan, we're going to do these up. Where are the jars? Can I get them?" she said eagerly. And although her aunt protested that she must not spend any more of the beautiful afternoon shut into the house, Janet went steadily to work, following her aunt's directions with swift skilful fingers, and by half past four the cherries stood in shining rows of jars on the kitchen table, and Janet was washing her hands.

"You're going to stay with me tonight, dear," said her aunt. "We'll telephone home to mother, and then we'll make waffles for supper. Your Uncle Frank will soon be home, and he can take you back tomorrow morning when he drives down to the train. He can just as well take the train from Springdale as from our station."

But Janet already had her hat on and was gathering up her cloak and veil. There was a look of breathlessness in her face as if she had reached the limit of waiting.

"Thank you, auntie," she said, kissing her hastily; "but I really couldn't. I want to catch the next car back. Sorry about uncle and the waffles, but perhaps you'll have them next time. Bye-bye, I must hurry!" and she was gone.

OUT the kitchen door, scuttling down through the barnyard and the back pasture, over a fence, two fences, breathlessly speeding across a cornfield with the distant whirr of the country trolley in her ears! She climbed the last fence and stood rosy and panting just as the trolley came in sight over the hill. She had won! She had escaped from the motor party! They might even now be stopping at Aunt Nan's door, but they would not find her there; and Aunt Nan was wise enough to have a nice neat little excuse ready for her.

Aunt Nan, wise woman, had climbed to the second story hall window with a field glass and was watching her; just as in the old days she or Janet's mother used to watch the little trudging figure of the child Janet with her lunch basket in her hand going off to school alone. They always let her think she was doing everything "her own self," but their loving hearts kept watch from afar lest any danger should beset her steps. Aunt Nan was younger than Janet's mother, and had spent a number of years in her sister's home before her marriage, when Janet was a child, so the girl was as dear to her as if she had been her own. When she saw Janet safely on the trolley she went downstairs thoughtfully. Now, why had Janet been in such a hurry, and gone the back way instead of taking the trolley on the upper pike, which would have been much nearer?

Thoughtfully Aunt Nan went about her preparations for supper. She was recalling the days when Harley, a little boy, used to spend most of his time playing with Janet. That was when he was often left with nurse or caretaker in the country house,

But Janet only waved a graceful little hand

It had been a matter of deep speculation and anxiety between herself and her sister whether this darling of their hearts would find her old companion of her childhood days the same true knight as when he went away; and whether if he were changed for the worse the girl's young eyes would be clear enough to see and hold herself to her own fine course. But they might have known, she sighed pleasantly to her relieved heart. Janet was not the kind of girl to idealize an unworthy object. She was not weak enough to deceive herself with false excuses.

What had happened, the aunt wondered, as she watched the bent head and flushed cheeks, for Janet's color rivaled the cherries in vividness, and her aunt knew that it had been no trifle that had brought that look to the girl's face. Had the young man proved himself unworthy so quickly? Or what?

But she asked no further questions, and Janet chattered on excitedly about the Springdale people; what the Sordens were going to do with their big house now that their father was dead and there was no money to carry it on; about the Aid Society and the way the ladies trimmed the church every Sunday while his mother and father went to more lively places for their summering. There had been one whole winter when Harley stayed in the old Bruce house, with a maiden aunt, a tutor and the servants, while his people were abroad. That was when Harley was fourteen. He might have been said to have been partly brought up by herself and Janet's mother in those days. She went over again the summer when his mother suddenly pounced down upon him in the midst of all his eager plans and ordered him off to camp with a lot of boys he didn't like. Harley had rebelled stoutly, and but for Janet's mother, who talked with him calmly and gently about his duty to his parents, he might have been very disagreeable about going. The summers that followed had been broken with brief glimpses of Harley, who was being rushed through preparatory school. But the last summer before he went abroad he had spent two months in the old home, and the friendship between the two young people had been charming to watch, an almost ideal companionship, save for the lurking fear that something might wake them from their pleasant comradeship too soon and make them fancy they were in love before they were old enough to choose their future.

AUNT NAN, happy in her own late romance, had said good-by to the boy rather regretfully and somewhat wistfully when he went abroad. So many things might happen in the year, and he was such a charming, unselfish, fine, courageous fellow. Would he learn to put some one else in Janet's place while he was gone, or she some one else in his? It had seemed too bad to separate them when they had been so perfectly suited to one another. And yet they were only children, and she reflected that it might be a kind Providence that was taking him so far, for no one could tell what he might be going to turn out to be, especially with a worldly mother like his. And so the sisters had talked it over guardedly and on the whole been relieved that he was gone, although they both loved him.

But the years had brought no one to fill his place with Janet. She had been sweet and happy in her home and popular in her school, and had talked eagerly of Harley, reading frankly the pleasant letters that came at intervals from him describing his travels. But as the time drew near for his return Janet had grown reticent, seldom taking a part in the conversation when it chanced to touch on the Bruces. So had Janet's aunt and mother grown anxious.

THE motor party returned soon after Janet had gone, and Aunt Nan, placidly announcing that Janet had gone on the trolley, took deep satisfaction in watching the disappointment on the young man's face. She was not at all sure that she wanted Janet to care for him, but she was very sure that she wanted him to be adequately appreciative of the loveliness and worth of Janet. Also her sense of romance demanded that the young man should be true to his old comrade and be eager to have her company, even though he might not be the one she would pick out for her niece's life companion. She watched the handsome face cloud over with the same frank transparency wherewith he had been used to show his feelings in the old days, and decided that there was still a good deal of the old Harley left, even though he might have had a glossing over of this world's polish to cover the good true stuff underneath; and while she was glad that Janet had gone, and had not showed too much eagerness for his company, she still had a very warm feeling for the boy—yes, he still had enough of the boy about him to be likable, and Aunt Nan could afford to be cordial seeing that Janet was safely on her way home by this time. Somehow she hoped the boy would win out in the end and conquer Janet, but she was glad Janet was making him work for her friendship.

Harley was glad to see Aunt Nan, for she had always been a good friend of his, and he tried to be demonstrative in greeting her, but she could see he was deeply disturbed at not finding Janet.

SHE lingered at the door as the car glided away. Loud, clashing voices, bits of harsh laughter, a fragment of coarse slang floated to her. She had a good glimpse of Lotta Lomond's cynical, triumphant look as she turned her rapid little painted face toward Harley coming back alone to the car. Aunt Nan thought she understood why Janet had stoned cherries that afternoon instead of going motoring. It needed but a glimpse to show her what the atmosphere had been. She stood for a moment thoughtfully looking toward the evening sunset preparing in the West, and then went to the telephone and called up a number. "Is that you, Mary? Well, Janet went home half an hour ago on the lower trolley. She ought to be there pretty soon."

"On the trolley!" came the voice of Janet's mother over the wire.

"Yes, she's been helping me can cherries all the afternoon. I wanted her to stay all night, but she would go home. The party in the motor came back for her just now, and the driver seemed mighty disappointed not to find her here. She seemed sort of wrought up, and didn't explain much. If I were you I wouldn't bother about it. Let it work out. Jan's all right. She got the right idea. I just thought I'd give you a hint so you wouldn't be startled and would have a chance to think it out. Besides, I wanted to be sure she got home safe all right, going that lower trolley and having to change at Hapgood's Corners just when all the workmen are coming home from the mills. You let me know if she doesn't get home all right pretty soon."

"She's just coming in the gate, Nan. Thank you. I guess I won't let her know you told me. Good-by."

Mrs. Grayson met her daughter at the front door.

"My dear! You're home so soon! You didn't come in the car! Is anything the matter?"

"Nothing, mother, only I didn't fit in that crowd, and I got Harley to let me off at Aunt Nan's. I came home on the trolley."

"But wasn't that very hasty judgment, dear?" her mother asked anxiously.

"No, it wasn't! If you had been there I almost think you would have jumped right out in the road before you got there. Mother, they were unspeakable!"

"They! Not Harley, too?"

"I'm—not sure! I think not. He couldn't very well help things—Oh, mother, I can't talk about it just now; I must think it out first. Would you very much mind if I went right to bed? I'm so tired, and I have a little headache."

"That's the best thing you can do, dear. Go right up and I'll bring you a bit of toast and a cup of tea. You get a good sleep and things will look all right in the morning."

MRS. GRAYSON did not fold her daughter in her arms and kiss her as she would have liked to have done. She was wise enough to realize that the girl had been under a heavy strain and that the least bit of tenderness would break down her self-control and make a mountain of grief out of what might turn out to be but a molehill of disappointment. So she slipped away with a pleasant smile to the kitchen to make ready a tempting little tray.

She had no more than finished and come down stairs again when a car stopped noisily at the gate and Harley dashed up to the door, his face excited, a look of real anxiety in his eyes.

"Mother Gray!" he cried, dropping back into the old name he used to call her when he was a boy; "is Jan home yet? She gave me the slip. I'm terribly disappointed."

Mrs. Grayson's resentment cooled, as had her sister's before the boy's open distress. He always had a way of winning people.

"Yes, she's at home, Harley, but she had a headache and she's gone to bed. I'm sorry, Harley, but I'm sure she'll feel all right in the morning."

The young man's face showed such blank disappointment as he echoed her words, "Gone to bed!" that she was almost minded to go up and make Janet slip on something and come down to him. Then a glance at the noisy party at the gate reminded her that Janet probably knew what she was about when she went to bed before dark.

"Then she'll not be able to come over to dinner this evening?"

"I'm afraid not, Harley," she answered gently. It was hard to disappoint this boy whom she had loved genuinely for so many years.

HARLEY turned without a word and walked slowly down to the gate with his head drooping dejectedly. She noticed that he did not pay any attention to the loud greetings that assailed him as he got into the car and drove off. With a sigh of regret she turned back again, wondering if Janet had really meant to hit him so hard, or if she had not quite understood the situation. She could see that Harley's disappointment was genuine. Yet she dared not put a meddling finger into the matter. Her girl must work this life problem out for herself. It was the only way. And she could safely trust Janet's clear-eyed judgment, she was sure, even with her heart pulling in another direction. She gave another sigh for the world of girls who must push through alone to the solution of just such perplexing questions, though all around were willing wise ones who would fain reach out helping hands yet dared not, because each soul must live his life himself after all, and choose his own way through the wilderness. Through her mind floated a line of an old poem:

I, nearer to the wayside inn,
Am weary thinking of your way.

And then she smiled again as she realized that each individual wanted to live his own life through and find the joy for himself that was mingled with the sadness. Several times before she slept she stole into the girl's room and stood with bated breath listening; but Janet's breath came regularly, as if she slept without a thought of perplexity; and, relieved, the mother went away to her own rest.

IN the morning, however, Janet was astir early, and came down dressed for a journey. To her mother's look of surprise she answered:

"I'm going up to the city, mother, to get done that long-delayed shopping. I ought to have gone before, but I couldn't spare the time from summer. I think I'll stay till the late train and take dinner with Hester. You know she has written three times begging me to come to her. You needn't worry about me. I'll go there before dark, and Hester always takes me to the station in the car."

"Oh, Janet! Do you think you'd better?" asked her mother, remembering Harley's disappointed face the night before. "I am sure Harley was expecting to come over this morning. He seemed greatly disturbed that you had a headache and he couldn't see you last night."

Janet's face was inscrutable. She was silent for a moment and then she said quietly:

"Yes, I think I'd better go. He didn't say he would be here this morning, did he?"

"Why, no," said her mother; "he didn't say so, but he looked it. He was quite upset."

But Janet's face hardened.

"I think I will go," she said.

A few minutes later Janet, in dark blue taffeta, with a trim little blue straw toque and a bunch of fresh pansies at her belt, went swiftly to the station through the fresh summer morning.

Half an hour later, it being the first minute that his code of etiquette allowed him to call upon a young lady who went to bed the night before with a headache, Harley came bounding up the walk and called out joyously to Mrs. Grayson, who was watering the flower beds:

"Morning, Mother Gray! Isn't Jan up yet? I couldn't wait another minute."

He was good to look upon as he stood there in all his young strength, arrayed in white flannels, the sun shining through the trees on his crisp curls, his face all eagerness as if he were but fifteen. The mother in her hated to spoil that eager joy in his eyes.

"I'm sorry, Harley," she said gently, "but Janet found she had to go to the city this morning. It was something she had been putting off for weeks."

Harley dropped blankly down on the front steps.

"Gone to the city!" he said as if he couldn't quite comprehend. "Oh, Mother Gray! Why didn't you call me up? I'd have gone along. You didn't use to like to have her go to the city alone (reproachfully)! You never used to let her!"

"I know," sighed the mother, "I don't like to let her yet, but she's grown up, you know, and she's been away to college. I can't keep her a baby always."

She smiled ruefully.

"Besides, Harley, you're a man. I shouldn't have felt free to call on you for a service like that."

"Now, Mother Gray! Don't you know me better than that! After all these years!"

Harley's tone was reproachful and hurt.

"How do I know you after all these years, Harley? You may have changed."

"But I haven't changed!" he said impetuously. "You don't think I'd change do you? Mother Gray is that why Janet ran away from me—because she thinks I'm changed?"

"Why, Janet didn't—"

MRS. GRAYSON paused and lifted truthful eyes to the young man's face. She knew Janet had run away. She could not tell him Janet hadn't. The polite phrase lingered on her lips while her eyes told the truth.

"She does!" said the boy bitterly, now wholly a boy. "Jan thinks I'm changed! And she doesn't like me, and that's why she ran away!"

He had risen and flung himself half away from her, his face showing deep feeling.

Mrs. Grayson put her hand on his arm, her heart much moved for him.

"Janet doesn't know whether you are changed or not, Harley. Don't you understand? She hasn't seen you in four long years."

But Harley kept his face turned away and was silent. Suddenly he flashed a question:

"Mother Gray, is Jan engaged?"

"Oh, no, Harley!"

"Is she—Does she care—Is there anybody else?"

"Why—not that I know of, Harley. She hasn't very many intimate friends."

Harley turned with a relieved look in his eyes, and grasped her hand in his old impetuous way.

"Thank you, Mother Gray," he said, a world of meaning in his eyes. "Jan's wonderful, don't you think? She's grown more beautiful, too, and I didn't think that could be. I haven't seen a girl in Europe that's her equal. Say, do you know where she went? If I'd go up on the noon train do you think I could find her?"

"I don't know," hesitated Janet's mother. "She had some errands and was going to see our lawyer, but she is dining with a friend—"

Harley's face went down again.

"Oh! Then she won't be home till the late train. Well, perhaps she wouldn't want me around. I'd better wait, I suppose. But anyhow I'll meet the train."

The mother eyes watched him go away, watched him critically, anxiously, lovingly, and could find no flaw in him. What had Janet seen? Or missed?

Then after all Janet came back on the seven o'clock train. Hester had been away at the seashore, so there was nothing to keep her later. Besides, it seemed to Janet that she had been away a week.

She slipped into a little cool white frock, ate her supper and went out to the hammock. Harley thought she was not coming till the late train, so she would not be disturbed, and she could perhaps think out her perplexities before he came; whether she should go to bed with another headache, which was even worse this time than the evening before, or face him and have it out.

What the 'Quake Did to Guatemala

Christian Herald Relief the First to Reach the Stricken City

GUATEMALA CITY is slowly recovering from the effects of the series of destructive earthquakes which laid a large part of the city and the surrounding country in ruins. The work of restoring such of the wrecked buildings as can be made habitable is now being pressed forward vigorously. Relief work among the destitute and homeless is also going on energetically, as the following letters, received by the Christian Herald, show: "Some time ago, we received your cable putting $1000 at our disposition for the suffering people of this city. There are two missions at work here and this money has been equally divided among them, and we have been expending it, asking God for daily guidance and direction in the matter [for the alleviation of the suffering of the people. A goodly part of it has been expended in buying corrugated iron roofing and furnishing clothing, buying rice, beans, etc., for the people and in a number of other ways which I am sure you would most heartily approve of.

"We appreciate your immediate relief in this matter, and your prompt response to my cablegram. The very promptness of your gift increased its value, as it came before any other relief had reached us. You were first on the ground with your gift. Will you kindly thank the readers of the Christian Herald and all those who were instrumental in sending this money, not only on behalf of the missionaries but on behalf of the people who received it, who showed their gratitude in a way that greatly touched our hearts?

"There is still a great need, in spite of all that has been done. The greatest of these needs facing us at present is the need of corrugated iron roofing to shelter the people. In the month of April, or May at the latest, the semi-annual rainy season commences, when we have the great torrential downpours of rain that will simply soak about half the people who have as yet no adequate covering. If it were possible to put a couple of thousand or more sheets of this roofing at the disposition of the people, selling some of it at cost to those who are able and willing to pay for it, and distributing the other, it would be a great blessing to the people at this time.

"There is also great need of clothing. It might be that many people at home could furnish us with second-hand clothing. This should not be too heavy, as we never have winter weather. A great many of the necessities of life can now be purchased here, but many of the people have no money with which to purchase them, so as always, by the means of ready money, we can help people help themselves. We are seeking to use great discretion in this matter of helping others, avoiding the danger of pauperizing them in any way.

"Assuring you of our most hearty appreciation of the gifts you have already sent, and that which you may send, and with a promise to use all our energies and care and discretion in the distribution of same, I am,

WM. B. ALLISON."

Guatemala City, Feb. 12.

Rev. A. E. Bishop of the Central American Mission writes: "I cabled in the first days of the disaster. Mr. Allison of the Presbyterian Mission turned over to our Mission half of the thousand dollars cabled him, the Presbyterian Mission and the Central American Mission occupying this city working on comity lines.

"We trust your Christian Herald readers are responding to the appeal which you set forth in your valuable paper. We assure you of our gratefulness and are confident that the Lord will not forget this labor and ministry of love.

A. E. BISHOP."

The Girl Who Hated Lessons

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I HATE my Latin," said the Schoolgirl. Quite crossly she threw her book across the room. "I hate my Latin, and I hate my algebra, and my English, and my French. I hate everything about school. I hate school!"

The Writer Lady had come into the room and quietly seated herself in the huge armchair. The Writer Lady visited the Schoolgirl's mother, and she loved the Schoolgirl very much indeed.

"I couldn't help hearing you just now," she said rather soberly. "Put down your home work for a moment, dear. I have a little story to tell you."

The Schoolgirl loved the Writer Lady very much, too. She ran across the room and perched herself cozily on the arm of the huge chair.

"There was once another girl," said the Writer Lady, "who hated lessons. And so while she was in school she laughed, and joked, and drew silly pictures, and wasted time generally. And at last, because she felt that she hated school, she stopped studying altogether, and stayed at home."

"It was all very nice for a while, and then suddenly the girl discovered that her friends knew more than she did. She found that there were books that she couldn't understand, and words that she couldn't pronounce. She found that her vocabulary was very limited. When anybody quoted something in Latin or French she had to guess at the meaning. She didn't know."

"The upshot of the matter was that she began to study again. It wasn't easy, for she did not have regular class hours and regular teachers. She found that it was more difficult for her to grasp things than it had been when she was younger. When she wanted to write she found that she lacked words, and it was long before she began to make any progress. And though that was years ago, she is still studying—trying to make up what she lost. That's the awfulness of wasting opportunities—they never come again in just the same way."

The Schoolgirl slid down from the arm of the chair, and, walking across the room, picked up the discarded Latin book. Quite suddenly she spoke.

"Did the girl tell you all this?" she questioned.

The Writer Lady laughed softly—a bit sadly. "I was the girl," she answered.

AN old proverb tells that opportunity only knocks once at the door—once in a lifetime. And then that opportunity, if the knock is not answered, goes quietly away and never reappears. And every small chance that one has to personally improve oneself—whether that chance be the studying of a hated lesson, or the doing of a small kindness for someone else—is perhaps the shadow of a knock at the door of your life.

I once knew a man who was a rather clever business man. But he had never really arrived, in the big way that his friends hoped that he might arrive, at the head of his profession. Once he spoke to me about it.

"Sometimes," he said rather wistfully, "I feel that my great opportunity has come and gone."

"What do you mean?" I questioned.

"Once, rather long ago," he told me, "there came the offer to me of a bit of work that I would have liked to handle. It was pleasant work, but there was no money in it, particularly, and I felt that I should concentrate on something that would mean more financially. The man who offered me the bit of work was sorry when I refused to do it. 'I know,' he told me, 'that there's not much in it now. But in time it will develop into something worth while.' But I was out after money, and though I felt instinctively, though I knew, that he was right, I wouldn't let myself take a chance. And I went out after things that have always had enough money in them, and not much of inspiration."

"The bit of work did develop. The man who took it is now famous and looked up to. And I am still doing work that is not particularly pleasant. And the tragic part of it is that I know it's my own fault."

"I'm sorry," I said. It was all that I could say.

"When I was a schoolboy," the man went on, apparently irrelevantly, "there was one study that I particularly didn't like. I knew that if I ever got to understand it I would like it. But it required more effort than I wanted to use, and so I dropped out of that class and used my time following the line of least resistance. The studies I worked over were the ones that it wasn't hard for me to get. And yet, when I came to college, the one study that I had dropped was my biggest obstacle. It kept me from going to the head of my class. It was another opportunity that had knocked, and that I hadn't answered."

EVERY one of us, I fancy, is meeting lessons in the school of life. We're doing it every day. And some of us petulantly toss away the book that will teach us correctly, just as the Schoolgirl tossed away her Latin book. It's hard to recognize some of the lessons that are hard to learn as opportunities.

But they are opportunities, every one of them. There isn't a lesson in life that hasn't been given to us for some perfectly good reason, just as there isn't a lesson in a school or college course that isn't necessary to that course.

In school it is the headmaster who decides that one should have a certain amount of Latin or algebra. In life it is God who decides the number of our lessons and the need of them. The headmaster, out of the depth of his experience, knows what it is best for us to learn. God, out of the wideness of his knowledge and love, knows also what we must master before we can call our life complete. And so every lesson that we throw aside is a directly negative answer to God's plan for us.

And like the Writer Lady, though we study for years after we discover our mistake, we can never quite catch up with the lessons that we didn't learn at the proper time.

THE KNOCK

I HEARD a knock at my cabin door
As I sat by my hearth one day;
It was winter then, and I watched the flames—
Watched in a listless way.
Then I heard a sigh, and the wind swept by
And I heard the tempest groan,
And I heard faint footsteps steal away,
But I, listless, sat alone!

I sat alone by my writing desk,
And my study door was tight,
And I wrote my thoughts in a stilted way,
Through the whole of a summer night—
And I heard a tap at my study door—
But I held my pen in my hand—
And I heard sad footsteps falter past,
But I did not understand!

I walked through the woods at autumn tide,
When the earth was red and gold;
And I gathered leaves from the lowest branch,
All that my hands could hold.
And I heard a knock at my very side,
But I did not turn to see,
For I thought that I heard a woodland bird
That pecked at some forest tree.

Ah, now I wait for the gentle knock,
And my door is open wide;
And I watch in vain for a guest to come—
A guest I may bid inside!
But the days are long, and my every song
Holds sorrow and fear and pain,
For I know the knock that I did not heed
May never come back again.

Questions and Answers

MARY C. F., Hitchcock, Minn. There is not and never has been any Scriptural warrant for denominations among the churches. Christ prayed that his church might be one; but such is the weakness of humanity, and such the greatness of divinity, that no man or set of men as yet has been able to comprehend fully all that lay within the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. Thus it has happened that individual teachers, grasping with a certain degree of conception certain elements of the truth more fully than others, have emphasized these elements, and have gathered about them those who were like-minded, and this school of thought has developed into a denomination. Within the denominations, certain elements of doctrine have again appealed more strongly than others, and groups so affected have split and developed new groups, thus going on from division to division until their multiplication has been almost a mockery of the Christ whom all profess to serve. Yet each of these branches of the church universal has done a certain service in bringing to the world a clearer comprehension of some part of the truth. Now, we are beginning to see the folly of it all, and are seeking to remedy the weakness of our divisions by the strength of united effort. In the larger cities, the churches are uniting in federations, cooperating in certain special efforts, and creating a Christian community conscience, which never could have been realized while church fought church, instead of all of them fighting sin. In the smaller towns unnecessary churches are being dropped, and all the Christians are uniting in one or possibly two churches, affiliating with the denominations most strongly represented in their united membership. The wisest thing for your little town with its 500 inhabitants and four empty church buildings is to unite and form a Union church—a Christian duty, that can unite all in service. Loyalty to a denomination is all right, but failure to attend church because we cannot find the service of our own denomination is often the beginning of the total loss of Christian faith.

Mrs. L. M., Bloomington, Ill. Are all sins pardonable, except the sin of blaspheming against the Holy Ghost?

Christ distinctly says so (Mark 3:29). Were they not, how would any of us finally fare, for we are all born in sin (Rom. 3:9), and none is righteous nor doeth good? If Christ had not come to save sinners, and bring them pardon for their sins, all must have been lost. The one unpardonable sin is held to be attributing the works of the Holy Spirit to Satanic agency.

H. M. J., Waterbury, Conn. Though fish is plentiful, prices are high for the same reason that butter, eggs, flour and coal are high. There is much evidence that profiteers and unpatriotic dealers are using the war, with its attendant commercial and transportation problems, as an excuse for taking advantage of the public.

Mrs. G. B., Clarksville, Iowa. 1. Since the new dispensation, the purely Levitical prohibitions have lost their force. 2. Christ teaches us to love our enemies and to pray for them that use us badly (Matt. 5:44), and the experience of earnest Christians shows this to be the best way to "hurt" an enemy—that is, to win him over. 3. Any game may be wrong if played with wrong motives, but only the innocent amusements of children and grown-ups are pleasing in God's sight. He wants his children to be happy and contented. 4. Your requests for prayer have been referred to the Prayer League.

Inquirer. 1. Please explain full significance of the word "perish" in John 3:16. 2. Give some Bible reference to the immortality of the soul.

1. To understand the word "perish," we must bear in mind the purpose of Christ's coming, which was to save from that which threatened mankind, namely, perdition—the state of being lost to all good here and hereafter. In the succeeding verse, the apostle speaks further of Christ's mission, which was also to judge the world, and "to judge" corresponds to the "may perish." This shows that the word "judge," though not in itself equivalent to "condemn," has reference to a judgment which may tend to condemnation. The whole question of judgment and condemnation lies with God, and it is useless for us to speculate or to go beyond what the Bible plainly teaches on the subject. 2. Read Rom. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:54.

Subscriber, Waterbury, Conn., and Mrs. R. B., Syracuse, N. Y. We cannot warn too much against any sect or creed that does not give all glory to God and which denies the fundamentals of Christianity. The theory of the mastery of the mind over certain bodily ills is as old as the hills.

J. S., Caledonia, Mich. Was the Samaritan woman of Jacob's well converted at her conversation with Jesus?

When Jesus revealed himself as the Messiah of whose coming she had feelingly spoken, she found the truth for which she had been seeking, and for the reception of which her heart was prepared. Her own belief she expressed to the Samaritan men in the question: "Can this be the Christ?" To have declared herself convinced would have done little to persuade the men of the village; but by putting the question to them she not only expressed the great conviction in her own heart, but she aroused in others that which is the forerunner of knowledge.

C. D. H., Bassetts, Va. Tradition has it that the Gospel was first preached in China by the Apostle Thomas. Early in the sixth century the Nestorians came. Rome first sent missionaries in the thirteenth century, and the Greek Church was established in Peking in 1685. The first Protestant missionary was sent by the London Missionary Society in 1807. In 1814 the first convert was baptized.

Subscriber, New Jersey. Please explain John 3:36, last clause.

As against the believer, we find here placed in contrast the man who disobeys; not an unbeliever, but one who wilfully goes against the power given to the Son. The Father having given all things to the Son, the power over all men is in his hands; therefore he that does not receive him by faith is guilty of disobedience of the Son's authority.

S. R., Indiana. That Judas felt remorse for his crime is shown by his course in returning the bribe money, or rather casting it down at the feet of the priests in the sanctuary, and then taking his own life. See Matt. 27:5. We nowhere read, however, that he repented. Remorse and repentance are not identical. One may feel remorse at having adopted a wrong course, when another choice might have given him greater advantage, and yet without the inward conviction that he had been guilty of sin. Much has been written about Judas and his sin, and one writer has even attempted to make him appear as overzealous in having done what he did to force Jesus to assume the title and authority of a king. The Gospel record, however, attributes to him no such motive. He was deceitful and treacherous from the beginning (see John 6:64-71; 18:3-5).

A. K., Lackawanna, N. Y. There is no mention of midweek prayer services in the Scripture, but there are many passages that urge and commend prayer at all times. See Matt. 6:6; 26:41; Mark 13:33; 14:38; Luke 18:1 and other related portions. In view of all that is available on the subject, no one can contend that a midweek prayer service is unauthorized.

L. E. Franklin, Jefferson City, Tenn., writes: "Prayer is the only language that moves the heart of God. His finger will place the handwriting on the wall in Europe's war. Our part in America is to hasten that hour. Then are we not slackers of the worst type if we do not hold up the hands of those who are fighting our battles? Why should not the American people take the initiative and devote a part of every church service to prayer for our brothers 'over there,' on the sea and in the air? Would it not strengthen the morale of our army? We have a heatless day, a meatless day and a wheatless day; why not have a prayerful day—one Sabbath day each month? And when the hour for service arrives, let all assemble in the churches and with united voice appeal to the God of hosts to confuse our enemy and give us the victory."

A. N. A. L., Pittston, Pa. 1. Playing cards for prizes is gambling. 2. The passage you quote is sound Scripture, and quite applicable today. 3. The whole question under discussion, as far as it relates to the multiplicity of church organizations, is one that must be solved in the near future. The great point at issue is church unity on the essentials, and Christian cooperation, rather than rivalry and needless wasteful competition such as now prevails. We consider the discussion timely and helpful.

J. D. E., Allentown, Pa. The statements made in Scripture as to the character of God, in Ps. 145:8, 9; Nahum 1:2 and Heb. 13:8, in one place represent him as slow to anger, and in another as one that revengeth. These statements are not contradictory. The wrath of God is all the more terrible because of his love and his long enduring patience. Paul places the two attributes in juxtaposition and shows how they are consistent (Rom. 11:22): "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God."

Reader, Bay City, Mich. The warning that men's days should be an hundred and twenty years (Gen. 6:3) has been held by some to imply that the ark was that length of time in building. The words, however, are frequently interpreted as declaring that in future that would be the normal length of life; but it is evident that this was not the meaning, because the ages of men living after the flood, as given in Gen. 11, are still of great length.

Get Rid of Rats and Mice

RATS and mice are the worst animal pests in the world. They destroy food, spread disease, ruin clothing, carpets, and other property.

In the United States, rats and mice each year spoil crops, food and other property valued at more than $200,000,000.

This destruction is equivalent to the gross earnings of an army of 200,000 men.

Rats and mice on your premises are not only expensive; they are dangerous to health.

Get rid of them. The Christian Herald is ready to help by showing you how to do it.

This week the Christian Herald offers free to its readers a valuable illustrated book of 24 pages entitled "House Rats and Mice." This book sets forth clearly the most practicable methods for dealing with the pests and getting rid of them. It is published by the United States Bureau of the Biological Survey.

To get a free copy, you have only to send your name and address with a 2-cent stamp for return postage to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C. Ask for the book by its title, "House Rats and Mice."

Jesus Requires Confession and Loyalty

International Sunday School Lesson for April 14

Mark 8: 1 to 9: 1

If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me

The King's Highway of the Cross

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

AFTER those stirring days in Galilee, when the rising hostility of the Pharisees was becoming more and more marked, Jesus took his little band of loyal ones away for a quiet conference in the mountains. They reached the most northern point touched by our Lord in his earthly wanderings, the neighborhood of Cesarea Philippi, with its wonderful dominating peak of Mount Hermon covered with glistening snow. Here for a short time he found the privacy he sought until gathering crowds began to claim his help once more.

He had time for the heart-to-heart talks he wanted with his disciples. He sensed the approaching crisis and was anxious to find how permanent was the impression made on the twelve. He also wished to prepare their minds and hearts for the certain fate which he knew to be impending over him. During that week or two spent in walking from village to village, and climbing the mountains, he seems to have made his greatest impress on the men who were to continue his work after him. The value of quiet, meditative, cumulative personal conferences was appreciated by the Master. Ever since then men have profited by religious retreats, conventions and conferences that have really shut out the world for a season that the Master might speak and be heard.

Opinions About Christ

As they walked and talked Jesus inquired as to the impression he had made on others. He wanted to contrast the conviction of the twelve with the passing opinions of the world. During this early ministry he had said little about himself and his place in the Kingdom. In fact, it is to the Gospel of John with its detailed exposition of the closing week of Christ's ministry that we have to look for teachings about the person of Christ. He had discussed in Galilee the Kingdom of God, its principles, its ways of life, its eligible list, its true members. He had discoursed in varied parables on the practical application of pure religion to life and conduct in the social relations. Now he asks what men think of himself.

It is interesting to glean the impressions of his ministry as manifested here and in other places by the reported words of outsiders. His work was prophetic—the highest title they could give to it. The least they said was that he was "one of the prophets." They were blinded to calling him a Messiah because of their prejudiced ideas as to what a Messiah would be. But they did call him another Elijah, another John the Baptist. And these were men unafraid of kings. The Nazarene was no gentle weakling as some have pictured him; if he was instinctively compared to the rugged Tishbite who had proved more than a match for King Ahab, he must have been a strong and compelling figure.

Peter's Great Confession

We do not appreciate highly enough this confession which so moved the heart of Jesus. Peter was a rough and ready man. Jesus was his neighbor, his friend, then his teacher, then his Master. Day by day Peter had seen everything there was about this Man who had called him. And now he boldly confesses him the Christ of God. We are apt to underestimate our intimates. No man is a hero to his valet. But the character of Jesus made the greatest impression on those nearest. Those who knew him best first called him divine, not those far away.

Besides this, Peter and the rest had overcome a great misconception of Messiahship in so great a degree that they could conceive of this humble, homeless wanderer being the long-awaited Christ. No king in regal pomp, no conquering soldier, but this divine teacher and friend, was the Messiah indeed. No wonder Jesus said that flesh and blood had not revealed the truth to them. It was the very revelation of God within teachable hearts. Christ had not lived with them in vain.

And I think it true that we all have more or less faulty ideas as to our Messiah until we have walked with him a good part of the way of life. It is only after a mature Christian experience and much thought and prayer that the true Kingship of Jesus dawns upon us in all its force and fulness and transfiguring power. Then with awe and holy joy we say softly unto him, "My Lord and my God."

"Thou art the Christ!" said Peter. No other answer is adequate. This is the Christian creed, to believe that Jesus is the fulfillment of the age-long search of the soul, that he is the revelation of the nature of the Father, that in him and only in him does life reach its highest meaning.

Yea, Amen. Thou changeless one, thou only
Art life's guide and spiritual goal;
Thou the light across the dark vale lonely.
Thou the Eternal Haven of the soul.

Jesus' Loyalty to His Mission

But even Peter had only partially sensed the Messiah's true service to man on behalf of God. He still had much to learn. Jesus states plainly now the very hardest teaching of all: himself must suffer and die for the world. How steadfast Christ was, with that hideous cross looming more and more plainly in view! How he rebuked all suggestion of avoidance of it, as plainly implying compromise on his part, swerving in loyalty to his Father's cause. The tempter had so spoken long before, suggesting some other way than the way of the cross.

Peter was moved to dissuade Christ by reason of the seeming defeat involved. But loyalty never hesitates to accept personal defeat and death for God's will. Peter was warm-hearted, as usual, but his advice was fatally wrong. It was really tempting because the right way for Christ, as for us, was so hard. But there is no easy way to save a sinful world. One must give oneself utterly. There is no royal road of glory but the King's Highway of the Holy Cross, as deep-thinking Thomas à Kempis tells us so well. Look up his chapter on the Way of the Cross.

The Loyalty Demanded of Christians

The same sort of loyalty is essential to the followers of the Messianic leader. Jesus went right on to apply the rule to all. If any man would come after me, he too will find that the only sure path into the Kingdom leads by way of a cross. And the cross means no trifling thing, no mere bearing of petty grievances, no easy relinquishing of extras. The cross means consecration even unto death, and that shameful, unappreciated, ignominious death. Not every Christian comes to the cross in literal fact, of course. But every genuine, sincere and worth-while follower of Jesus has that willingness, that self-dedication, before he shares the full joy of his Lord. It is only those who have given all, at least in spirit, who can fellowship with Him who gave all that he had and all that he was for them.

That is why we see at once the Christ-likeness of the great missionaries who are the Church's inspirers in every age. We can see how they fulfilled the pledge:

I'll go where you want me to go,
I'll do what you want me to do,
I'll be what you want me to be.

But we ought not to fail to see loyalty at home, among the humblest members of our own church. If you have never

WORSTED KNITTING YARN OF HIGHEST QUALITY

The Patriotic Yarn Association was organized to supply the women of this country with the best worsted knitting yarn in the market at the lowest possible cost, allowing only for the expense of distribution—with the understanding that they will make up garments for men in the service of the United States and her Allies.

We desire to reach the individual knitter direct that she may be unrestricted in the disposition of her finished garment, provided only that she knit solely for the above-mentioned cause and give her written word of honor to that effect. We also gladly help out small organizations of recognized reputation working for patriotic purposes.

3-in-One Oil Keeps Tools in A-1 Condition

Whether you use tools much or little, you want them to work smoothly and effectively when you do use them.

It's exasperating to fetch out your tools for a little household job and find them rusty, dirty and dull.

Use 3-in-One regularly on every tool—automatic drills, screwdrivers, brace and bit, wrenches, saws, planes, chisels—and they'll always be in A-1 condition.

Oil the action parts of automatic tools with 3-in-One. It lubricates perfectly and never gums or collects dirt.

Wipe the blades of saws and edge tools with a little 3-in-One on a soft cloth. It absolutely prevents rust—keeps them clean and bright and preserves the sharpness of the edges. Makes saws work much easier.

Wipe the wooden handles of your tools, too—3-in-One cleans and polishes them. And put a few drops of 3-in-One on your oil stone before using it—you'll find it sharpens tools more quickly and easily.

3-in-One Oil is sold at all stores—in 25c Handy Oil Cans, and in 15c, 25c and 50c bottles. Get it and you'll get more satisfaction out of your tools.

seen a really fine Christian in your own church fellowship, then your eyes are faulty; they do not see what Christ surely sees. If you do not see loyal strugglers after the very fashion of Peter himself, you must lack charity, if not spiritual vision. They are with us, all around.

Above all, do not let us allow Peter's crowning blunder, which comes as naturally to us as to him, to put us also in the tempter's place. That is, let us be careful to avoid advising our loved ones, our own boys and girls, to look for the easiest way. How many Christians have been guilty of advising youths not to study for the ministry, girls not to go to the missionary training school, only the thwarted Master knows. What a dreadful thing when some soul courageously choosing the way of sacrificial service, whatever it may be, hears a trusted friend saying, "Be it far from thee; this shall never be for thee." Why, you are stabbing the soul-life of your friend! Remember how Jesus turned in quick sorrow to rebuke Peter.

Because the law of life is sacrifice, the lower must be subordinated to the higher and the flesh to the spirit. Without sacrifice seeming life is really death, seeming gain is heavenly loss. The whole world knows this now. All philosophy agrees with Jesus as to the high cost of selfishness. The givers truly save, the keepers starve their own souls. "Earth gets its price for what earth gives us."

Friends, there is just one redeeming feature of this awful war. That is, men are learning to give. Our sons offering their lives have become nobler than ever they were before. Our brothers and sisters giving their means lavishly, their time until utterly worn out, their prayers and earnest thoughts, yea, their children, have become sons and daughters of the unselfish God who so loved that he gave, and gave his best. The world indeed is being crucified afresh, and in some quarters the Son of God is being put to shame. But from this Calvary there shall come in God's good time another Easter and an enlarged entrance into the Kingdom of God for all the world.

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Memorizing Living Truth

ONE of the greatest assets in any life is the memorizing in boyhood and girlhood of great hymns and Bible chapters and passages. Many a man and woman in later life has reason to be grateful beyond measure for those stored-up treasures which are brought out to strengthen, help and comfort the life in hours of temptation, disappointment and sorrow.

It is a good thing not simply to learn these passages but in the Bible to mark them and give them names that will make them familiar and cherished friends.

The West Virginia Sunday School Association has selected twenty-five Bible chapters to be memorized by any boy or girl not over sixteen years of age and to be recited at the Annual Convention of the Association. Success in this recitation is to be rewarded by the presentation of a bronze medal.

On one side of the medal is an open Bible with the words inscribed on the pages: "Thy Word have I laid up in my heart." On the other side is inscribed: "Presented for memorizing twenty-five chapters of the Bible."

These chapters are as follows:

1. Genesis 1. Story of the Beginnings.
2. Exodus 20 : 1-17. The Law.
3. Psalm 1. True Blessedness.
4. Psalm 8. Jehovah's Glory and Man's Dignity.
5. Psalm 19. The Works and Word of God.
6. Psalm 23. The Shepherd Psalm.
7. Psalm 51. A Contrite Sinner's Prayer for Pardon.
8. Psalm 90. Our Eternal God.
9. Psalm 91. God is our Refuge.

10. Psalm 100. All Men Exhorted to Praise.
11. Psalm 103. Praise for Jehovah's Mercies.
12. Ecclesiastes 12 : 1-7. The God of Youth.
13. Isaiah 40. The God of all Comfort.
14. Isaiah 53. The Man of Sorrows.
15. Matthew 5. The Beatitudes.
16. Matthew 6. Sermon on the Mount.
17. Matthew 7. Sermon on the Mount.
18. Luke 2 : 1-20. The Birth of Christ.
19. Luke 15. God's Welcome to the Sinner.
20. John 14. The Comforter.
21. John 15. The Rule of Daily Living.
22. 1 Cor. 13. The Law of Love.
23. 1 Cor. 15. Assurance of Immortality.
24. Roman 8. The Spirit of Adoption.
25. Hebrews 11. Heroes of the Faith.

These twenty-five do not exhaust the line of fine memory chapters, and those which should be learned and marked by teachers and scholars. For instance, we have Ezekiel 36, Purity Chapter; Romans 3, Sin Chapter; Romans 10, Salvation Chapter; John 9, Light Chapter.

Any Sunday school or any teacher could well have such chapters indicated in writing or in print and distribute them to scholars to be memorized, say one new chapter a week, and then have a public recognition before the church when the work has been well done.

The Christian Herald Bible Picture Contest Plan may also be used for this purpose by selecting from the text book of Lessons, Home Readings and Golden Texts certain memory verses and passages then to be recited at the close of the series of lessons. The Christian Herald will be glad to forward samples of this Contest plan upon application.

"The Inner City"

THE St. Louis Church Federation, an organization of the Protestant ministers of St. Louis, at a meeting at the Schuyler Memorial last Monday heard a report of "Inner St. Louis," the district which is in the eastern section of the city, which contains one-half of the city's population, three-fifths of the saloons and four-fifths of the crime. The report was read by the Rev. A. H. Armstrong, chairman of the Committee on Comity of the St. Louis Church Federation. At the meeting it was decided to call a conference to provide for the betterment of this section of the city. In this district there are 73 Protestant churches and missions with a membership of 33,238. One of the special problems that confront the ministers of St. Louis in adopting a plan for the alleviation of the distressing conditions of "Inner St. Louis" is the fact that nearly one-half of the population is foreign born, and many are negroes. In this district there are 168 paid ministers and church workers, compared with 320 in the other sections of the city. The foreign born in this district are segregated in groups and are employed mostly in the factories of the city. The investigators found these conditions, which lead to most of the crime: Bad housing, many divorces, and much desertion and non-support. More than 78 per cent. of the arrests made in St. Louis during the year 1916 were made in the "Inner City." The same conditions obtain during the first eight months of 1917. The death-rate of tuberculosis was 520 here as compared with 396 deaths from that disease in the western section of the city during 1916. The St. Louis Provident Association during that year had given subsistence to 16,575 persons.

The St. Louis Training School

FOR the last five years the St. Louis churches, in conjunction with the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the Church Federation, and the St. Louis Sunday School Association, have maintained a training school for the young men and women of St. Louis to teach them to become efficient Bible teachers.

Fifteen courses are offered, covering all departments of Sunday School work, and the school is in charge of twenty-eight leading men as the faculty, with Professor George Platt Knox, assistant superintendent of the St. Louis public schools, as the dean.

All the members of the faculty give their services to this work without charge, and the rooms are furnished to the students by the Y. W. C. A. free.

Last year the school had an attendance of 304, the largest of any year in its history, and it expects a larger number this season. The pupils who attended last year were from eighty-seven churches and from twelve denominations. The pupils are capable persons who are actively engaged in the work at their home churches.

Making the Truck Work Both Ways

NCESSARY and valuable as is the horse to the small farmer, many of them are finding it to their advantage to operate a light half-ton or one-ton truck. The trucks by their superior speed make possible the reaching of better markets and they 30 cents per basket. At Wilmington cabbage brought 75 cents to $1.00 a basket, and potatoes 65 cents. On blackberries they gained $1.70 a crate by reaching the better market, and other products brought similar profitable increases over the home market which also insure early arrival—a tremendous advantage in any market.

One firm of truck-growers in Kent Co., Delaware, by the use of a half-ton truck was able to reach the Wilmington, Delaware, market forty-five miles away. They could not sell cabbage in their local market; potatoes brought but depended on rail transportation and the services of commission merchants. In one season they made 4,500 miles and sold $1,575 worth of produce and then earned back most of the operating expenses by hauling freight from Wilmington for their local merchants on the return trip.

Food Regulation in England

THE English food controller, Lord Rhondda, has fixed maximum prices for certain commodities and has put the people on a sugar ration so that now not more than half a pound per week is allowed to each individual. A sugar ticket for each member of the family is now required. The application forms when complete are sent to the grocer, who then forwards to the head of the household retail sugar cards for each individual who signed. This card is the authority for the person whose name it bears to receive his sugar. If he removes to another locality or another household he must present his card at a post office and will be given a "ration paper" entitling him to a supply of sugar from any grocer in his neighborhood. Other commodities will be parceled out under similar restrictions if the shortage becomes acute.

Some of the maximum prices established are interesting as compared with prices in this country, where the pinch of war has not yet been felt as it is on the other side. For example, roasted coffee can not be sold at more than one shilling sixpence (36.5 cents) per pound; butter must be retailed at not more than two shillings sixpence (60.8 cents) per pound and margarine is purchasable at a maximum price of one shilling (24.3 cents) per pound. The list of commodities upon which a maximum price has been fixed is rather long, and these will serve as fair examples.

The food controller has promulgated a large number of regulations covering the buying and selling of food, the object being to discourage waste and promote conservation. Information received by the United States Food Administration indicate that prosecutions of violators are frequent. A few examples from an official source are illuminating:

A baker was fined nineteen shillings sixpence ($4.74) for throwing six mouldy loaves of bread into a manure pit.

At Southampton, a merchant was fined £100 ($486.65) on six counts, charging him with selling potatoes at a price above the fixed maximum. He demanded £22 ($107.06) per ton instead of the legal £11 10 shillings ($55.96).

The wife of a collier pleaded guilty to a charge of wasting bread and was fined £5 ($24.33). A policeman had found two or three stones (28 to 42 pounds) of bread in a swill tub. The defendant's husband and three sons, all colliers, earned £11 (53.53) per week, and from one baker 62 2-pound loaves were purchased in three weeks, an average of 12 pounds per person over the food controller's allowance.

For feeding bread to fourteen dogs a certain woman was fined £5 ($24.33). She gave the dogs bread and milk for breakfast.

A certain minister was fined forty shillings ($9.72) for obtaining thirty-six pounds of sugar in order to preserve fruit. "He had only four plum trees in his garden, with half a dozen plums on them."

A fine of £25 ($121.66) was assessed against a woman for hoarding sugar. The police found forty pounds in the dining room and 103 pounds hidden under a bed.

Several milk-producers were fined for charging a retailer one shilling eightpence (40.5 cents) and one shilling sixpence (36.5 cents) per gallon, the maximum allowed being one shilling fourpence (32.4 cents).

Nearly eight per cent. of the eggs marketed in the United States are lost through spoilage or breakage. Much of this loss could be prevented through community egg circles.

Loyalty in Little Things

THE whole great problem of winning the war rests primarily on one thing: The loyalty and sacrifice of the American people in the matter of food. If we are selfish or even careless, we are disloyal; we are the enemy at home. Now is the hour of our testing.—U. S. Food Administration.

Rodeheaver's most recent song book, "Awakening Songs" is adding further to its victories in being used in the

at the present time. "Awakening Songs" already ranks as the most satisfactory and practical Gospel song book offered church workers. The thousands attending the "Billy" Sunday meetings have been aroused to the highest enthusiasm by the stirring words and music of these Gospel Hymns.

"Awakening Songs" was compiled after consultation with successful leaders throughout the country, and meets the requirements of today. Both the new and old songs have since received the most grueling test in "Billy" Sunday meetings, and proved 100% useful. Thus "Awakening Songs" is a book of Gospel music that is adapted to religious bodies anywhere whether it be in the smallest hamlet or the great metropolis.

RODEHEAVER'S "AWAKENING SONGS"

embodies the results of Mr. Rodeheaver's practical work and observations as a leader of large religious bodies. He has studied and knows the various types of Gospel music best suited for Gospel work.

Charles H. Gabriel adds his wide experience as a writer to Mr. Rodeheaver's experience as a leader. Together they have produced a work that has no superior in the gospel music field.

In addition to the new songs, "Awakening Songs" include many of the most effective of the old solos, duets and quartets. This includes songs by popular writers of gospel hymns and songs; and the standard devotional hymns so familiar and well loved by all. A 256-page collection of inspiring songs that will put new life and energy into any Sunday School, Young People's Meeting or Sunday Evening Service.

Sample copy sent for 15 days free examination to those interested; or single copies sent postpaid on receipt of price, cloth 35¢; limp 25¢; manila 22¢. Send for Rodeheaver's catalog of Gospel Music for Home and Church use.

Camp Merritt

IT is all summed up in the parting incident which I observed one Sunday evening when I was about to return from camp to the railroad station to speed homeward. The rays of the setting sun were turning the snow-covered fields of New Jersey into sparkling sheets of silver. I was seated in the bus waiting to start, when a mother approached with her son. She was a plain little woman, hallowed by the dignity of sacrifice. He was an upstanding, clean-cut young fellow, the kind a mother can well feel proud of. Before he handed her into the bus he kissed her and their eyes moistened. Then the gears meshed with a grinding sound, and we were off. He remained standing looking after while she looked back to him until a bend in the road blotted him out of view, a proud little smile playing about her face moistened by the tears of mingled fear and hope. When she could see him no more, she looked down and folded her hands in prayer. She had bade her last farewell to her son. God only knew whether he would return, for Camp Merritt is one of the embarkation camps of the United States troops, from which they depart for France.

On the day that we were there, a Sunday, we saw men continually coming and going with bags containing their belongings over their shoulders. There were men there from every state of the Union and from most of the training-camps, awaiting the order to embark. In the week, rumor had it that 18,000 men had left.

Not all of them are so fortunate as the young man we saw, to have their loved ones bid them farewell at this camp. Many parents, however, and friends come from great distances. The hostess house, conducted by the Y. W. C. A., on the edge of the military reservation, has many interesting stories to tell. It forms the meeting-place for fathers and mothers to greet their sons in camp. The camp authorities facilitate this service in every possible way.

WHEN we stepped into the front hall of the large mansion acquired by the Y. W. C. A. as hostess house, every room was filled with visitors chatting with soldiers. Miss Butler, who has charge of the building, told us that as high as seven hundred visitors came a day. I asked her about the spirit of the men and their relatives. She said the men are jubilant to move. It means change from the routine of training camp. They are anxious to see the other side. And the women, too, the mothers and wives, are brave. Only when they come and find their soldiers gone, then they break down. One wife, a war bride, came all the way from St. Louis to bid her husband farewell. When she arrived, he was gone. Her disappointment was more than keen. Yet she bravely bore it and returned to do her part at home. One woman, a wealthy, refined Southern woman, came up from South Carolina to see her son. She was willing to sleep anywhere and forego all comforts only to be near her son. One family came from Cuba and stayed two weeks. Their son had enlisted among the first when the country's call for volunteers was published.

But touching as it is to realize that many men take along with them the strengthening cheer of a parting word from loved ones, only a small percentage are thus favored. Tens of thousands pass through, only a few hundred meet friends or relatives. It would seem that the spiritual forces of America would concentrate at this point with a farewell message of Christ that would reach all and leave no heart untouched.

The Y. M. C. A. is doing all it can to meet the call. Its work at Camp Merritt has a very strong positive Christian ring. The men, too, turn out in great numbers to its services. In three weeks in one of the huts there were 156 decisions for Christ. One case illustrates the force of Christianity at this hour of parting from the home land. He was a preacher from Montana. For some reason or other he had left his congregation. He joined the army and went with it into Mexico, and now he was here about to go to France. When he broke with his church, he broke with Christianity! It was at an evening service in the Y. M. C. A. hut. The secretary had dwelt on the sixth petition: "Lead us not into temptation." The back-slidden minister had heard him, and he came up, and made his confession and promised to stand on Christ's side in the months and years that are before him.

IT is, of course, impossible to do much extended work. The men come and go so quickly. Sometimes they come at night to leave the next morning. Every effort is bent on making the spiritual work of the companies self-sustaining, by organizing Bible-classes in every unit, that should have their teachers and officers in that unit. In many cases that has been very successful. An ice plant company had a group of twelve men prepared to carry on the work. When the order was given late one evening for them to move the next morning at five, they obtained permission to go to the Y. M. C. A. building and there they had their last meeting on the home shore with prayer and Scripture reading, consecrating themselves to their work.

Much depends on the attitude of the officers and public officials. When the officers encourage a Christian life the task is easy. Many do. Some decidedly don't. I received an interesting communication from Governor Edge of New Jersey in regard to the religious work at Camp Merritt. He writes:

I have always been an enthusiastic advocate of the work in and about the training cantonments of the Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., churches and kindred organizations, for the reason, principally, that they are well organized, directly on the ground, and therefore in a position to do the work most effectively and with the least cost and effort. It is needless for me to dwell upon the value of the social and religious work such as organizations of this type are doing. In fact, I might say that the aim has been to maintain a high standard of morals among the men in the military service and to provide social and athletic diversion rather than to dwell particularly on any form of worship. In other words, there has been a most refreshing lack of religious prejudice or bigotry in and about the training camps. To pass through these cantonments and to see large buildings maintained by the Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, the Junior O. U. A. M. and other organizations all of them conducted along the same lines, striving hand in hand to cooperate for one end, the physical and moral improvement and general betterment of the soldier, is to me a most inspiring sight.

None have an ax to grind. The sole aim is patriotism. It is well known that the moral side of a soldier's character must not be neglected if his training for service is to be of the one hundred per cent. order. This is what our organized societies are endeavoring to do and there is no question but what their work is of equal importance with that of military instructors.

I only hope for the continued support of the public for all such activities which are not of the visionary kind but are on the job because they are on the ground.

The churches in the vicinity of Camp Merritt are as thoroughly organized as any group of churches near a camp. There are perhaps a dozen churches within the vicinity of the camp. None of these, however, is really a large church. The churches have set themselves a very elaborate program, to establish a normal social life by drawing the men into the home life of the community and into the activities of the church. As many as 800 men have been sent by the Y. M. C. A. into the various churches of a Sunday. Furthermore, the camp surroundings are clean and a good deal of the credit belongs to the church people, though the leadership was in the hands of the mayors of the surrounding towns.

But with the best of efforts the local churches cannot hope to cope with the task unaided. The men come and go too quickly and there are too many. At times there are over 30,000 men in camp. Camp Merritt is the point where every denomination must make its supreme effort for the men that have gone out from its churches. It is the last opportunity where American Christians can bring the comfort, strength, the appeal of Christ Jesus to their sons on the home shore. O. H. P.

The Little Child-Waifs of France

"THE Godmother of Good Works" is the name which has been given to the Department of Civil Affairs of the American Red Cross in France. And of all the good works that are done, none is quite so appealing to the heart and imagination as that which is done for the French children.

Here is a story which can best be told just as it comes from France:

She was just a tiny bit of a French child, not more than three or four years old. She was wandering about the Casino at Evian, quite independently, and found herself in the line of repatriated children, waiting to be examined by the American Red Cross doctor.

She may have been lost, but she seemed very happy, humming a vague and wandering scrap of a tune. What she had been through, back where the German army rules, no one knew; some of the grown-ups were weeping with joy to be among friends again. It came her turn to be examined.

"What is your name?" the Red Cross nurse asked.

"Marcelle," piped the four-year-old.

"And your other name?"

"Je ne sais pas!" (I do not know.) the child answered, with the unconcern one reserves for trifles.

The nurse was bothered. She had a card to fill out. . . . and here was a child come back to France that did not know its own name!

"Don't you see her there!" asked the nurse. "Which is your mother?" And she pointed to a whole crowd of them.

"Which one?" Marcelle echoed, a little plaintively. Then she found her brave answer by climbing up into the nurse's lap, did this Frenchwoman of four years:

"Ici, tout le monde est ma mère, tu sais." (Everybody is mother to me here.)

The Red Cross nurses are proud to be the "mother" of such children as these, who have just been sent back to France by the Germans because they are too young to be forced to work and because they did not want the burden of feeding them even the meager children's rations any longer.

Here is another story from one of the American Red Cross children's refugees:

"Two little sisters, Yvonne and Pierrette, were among the first to come to the Château des Halles. Yvonne is ten years old; Pierrette is eight. Their father and mother both died long before; they have no distinct memories of them. Before the war they lived with an older sister and a friend in Lens. The friend was repatriated with them, but went to Paris; the sister was left behind. Lens is a mass of crumbled brick and stone now, shattered by a six months' rain of shells; but Yvonne and Pierrette were sent to Belgium in the spring, and they do not know.

"Are you going to Lens?" Yvonne asks me, as I say good-by on leaving the château.

"I can't," I say. "The Germans are still there."

"But they won't always be there, will they?"

"No," I answer with assurance born of faith.

"And when they are gone, you will go to Lens?" she urges.

"I'd like to!"

"Well, if you do go to Lens," Yvonne instructs me, "you tell my big sister Marthe—she lives at No. 3131," and she gives me the name of a street where no single house now stands erect—"you tell Marthe that it's nice here, and that I want her to come here, too."

Incidents like these are all part of the day's work of the Red Cross worker in France. The tragedy of the children—that is the thing which, they say, is beyond words, beyond all powers of description. For the children of France they are constantly asking for more support from the people of the United States. They are aiding directly in the saving of 50,000 of the coming generation in France. They hope to aid in lessening infant mortality in France from 80,000 to 40,000 deaths a year.

This is one of the many great works on behalf of which the American Red Cross, belonging in a very literal sense to the American people, since it now has more than 23,000,000 members, makes its second appeal.

The American Red Cross "Over There"

THE Department of Civil Affairs of the American Red Cross in France was instituted upon the arrival of the Red Cross Commission on June 12, 1917. It was placed under the charge of its present director on July 24 with a staff of thirteen persons. The staff of the department now numbers 364 persons, not including 138 members of the American Friends' Unit.

From a shelter for refugee children, the department has grown since July 24 to include work in 63 towns and cities besides Paris, and it is extending aid in hundreds of cities, villages and hamlets.

Seven hospitals, with a combined capacity of 942 beds, of which 472 are for children and 470 for tuberculous patients, are now operated directly. Money granted by the American Red Cross has enabled the English and American Friends to extend the work of their maternity home at Chalons, and to establish and operate a general civilian hospital of thirty beds at Sermaize. Red Cross money will complete a tuberculosis sanatorium of 300 beds near Paris and one of 123 beds in a Paris hospital.

Twenty-eight dispensaries, three of them in Paris, are in operation.

A refuge at Toul houses 466 children and mothers from gas-bombarded villages; thirty children under four years of age, are cared for in a Friends' home by Red Cross money; and a refuge for old and infirm repatriates at Cannes has been enabled to reopen its doors by meeting half the cost of operation, above the amount allowed by the French Government.

Aid to repatriates returning from occupied France and Belgium begins at Evian, near the Swiss border, where each train is met by automobiles and ambulances. Since the establishment of the service 13,708 children have been examined and 367 treated in the Red Cross hospital at Evian. Children are sent to a Red Cross hospital near Lyons; tuberculous repatriates are referred to a Red Cross hospital in Lyons; and the thousands of homeless old men, women and children who leave Evian, 600 each day, to be billeted in strange departments because their own villages are devastated or in enemy territory, are to be met from now on by American Red Cross delegates, who have been cooperating with local organizations, for some weeks in advance, in re-establishing livable homes.

In Paris this department has made an examination of all unfinished apartment buildings, and it has already turned over nineteen buildings, which will house 554 families or 2,800 persons, to refugee and housing organizations for completion.

A survey has been made of French re-educational schools to enable war cripples to become self-supporting; the information thus gained is being sent to the United States in written and photographic form.

In the reconquered region there is an organization through which distribution of farm machinery, furnishings, clothing and food is made through local agencies. In villages allotted to the Red Cross by the French Government a gang of Belgian workmen, under Red Cross direction and pay, are repairing houses and barns.

In most cases the Red Cross has co-operated with existing organizations through grants of money or goods. The total amount of money thus contributed to January 1, 1918, is 1,620,244.37 francs. In all 397 grants of goods have been made to 322 organizations.

All grants of funds or food are made after careful inquiry as to the organizations aided.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

A Show Window of Dependable Goods

FEW things are more attractive to the visitor in a great city than the show windows of the big stores. Their displays of up-to-date merchandise help one decide what to buy and where to buy it. They guide to a satisfying choice.

The advertising pages of CHRISTIAN HERALD are like these show windows of great stores, where every human need is catered to. And they have this advantage: You need never doubt the quality of their merchandise. When it is displayed in CHRISTIAN HERALD it becomes the merchandise of CHRISTIAN HERALD—just as dependable.

CHRISTIAN HERALD doesn't carry in stock or show in its windows (its advertising pages) a single line of merchandise, a single line of advertising, that isn't up to CHRISTIAN HERALD standard. You can shop here with confidence, with certainty of receiving what you pay for every time.

TO ORDER OUTFITS FOR THE NATIONAL BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

But Participants Have Until May 31 to Mail In Answers

START the great National Bible Picture Study now—the Third Study in which $5,000.00 in cash will be awarded!

You have until April 22d to order your Outfit, and orders mailed even as late as that day will be filled.

You have until May 31st to submit your answers, and sets of answers mailed even as late as that day will be accepted. Answers must not be submitted until April 23 at the earliest.

So you've plenty of time to compete—but no time at all to delay about starting. Begin today, and you may gain the highest cash award of $1,000.00, while studying the Bible, while gaining a wonderfully freshened knowledge of the Word.

Second Prize Winner Gains a Three Fold Reward

WORDS cannot express the joy and satisfaction experienced in knowing that I have won such a generous reward in the Second Bible Picture Study. Aside from the cash reward, for which I am duly grateful, another prize was won which cannot be stated in dollars and cents. Not being a Bible student, must confess that I was unaware how much great help I was missing, in not utilizing the wonderful sayings and teachings of the Bible, to smooth the stormy pathway of life.

Your booklet "Pearls from the Bible" was most appropriately named, for from its pages faithfully perused, one gleaned many pearls of priceless value. I did not enter your First Bible Picture Study, but when the second one came out, made up my mind to try anyway—and my success has shown me what one can do, when one tries. Spent many pleasant hours on this study, and enjoyed every minute of it.

Albert J. Heinzman
Winner of the $800.00 Prize in the Second Bible Picture Study

Will say that I found the most difficult part of the study to be the elimination of verses, and choosing those most applicable. Every contestant has an equal chance for rewards; and the reward is three-fold: Morally, Mentally, and Financially.

Beside the entertainment afforded and the opportunity of splendid financial rewards to be gained there is a Grand Prize to be drawn by every contestant: that is the mental training one receives in competing.

Am in the postal service at a military camp. Being above draft age am very anxious to enter the foreign postal service in France, to do my bit toward giving Democracy to the world.

Complimenting you on the splendid manner in which your Second Bible Picture Study was handled, I will also try and help spread a knowledge of God's word.

Thanking you for the splendid rewards for my efforts,

Albert J. Heinzman, Texas.

ALL the thirty pictures—the complete series—will be sent you at once, together with the Reference Book of Bible verses, called International Bible Readings and the Answer Book.

You will then spread all the pictures out on the table before you, and enter into the absorbing test of finding, in the reference book, the verses that are best illustrated by the pictures.

Then write your selected verses in the Answer Book, and send it in—you have as much opportunity as any person anywhere to gain first award.

Make your decision: Order the Outfit today! You have practically two months in which to compete, with all the Study equipment in your hands from the start!

To the left is International Bible Readings, the reference book of about 2,000 Bible verses. From these verses all must choose their best verses for the thirty pictures. Verses not found in the official list cannot be accepted as answers.

To the right is the Answer Book, in which participants will write down and submit their chosen verses for the pictures.

International Bible Readings is not only the reference book for the Picture Study—it is also a very valuable book in itself, to be treasured long after the Study has ended. It is composed of the Bible verses which make up the International Sunday School Lessons, Daily Home Bible Readings and Golden Texts for

Love Makes the Stitches

SHE was a little Austrian woman, and she was crossing the ocean on a great hostile liner. Most of the other women were the wives of Englishmen, and they could not forget that her country was at war with their land. They ignored her, and she was left much to herself. And yet—

One morning as she was walking up and down the deck in her solitary way she passed the steamer chair of a middle-aged Englishwoman who was knitting at a gray woolen sock. And suddenly she paused in her walk and held out both of her hands.

"Oh," she cried, in very good English, "will you not let me knit a few rows on that sock?"

The Englishwoman looked up. And her face was cold and rather hard. "I think," she said, "that you would scarcely want to knit on this sock! For it is going to an English colonel—my husband!"

The little Austrian woman looked at the colonel's lady. And there were tears in her eyes. "Listen," she said in a low, shaking voice. "I, myself, have a son. He is an officer in the Austrian army. But if you knew my son I do not think you would hate him! If I knew the colonel, your husband, I do not think that I would hate him, either. . . ." She paused for a moment before she went on, and then—"Now that the world is torn by war," she said, "we women must do what we can to keep a little love in it . . . May I, perhaps, knit a few rows on the sock?" Silently, but with tears in her own eyes, the Englishwoman handed over the gray wool.

That, during this war, is the women's mission. They must keep alive in this world the spark of love. And they can do it by knitting—knitting socks and sweaters and mufflers for the tired, cold, homesick boys who need them.

"The Patriotic Yarn Association" has made it possible for the women of our country to do their bit of knitting by offering to them the best knitting worsted on the market at the lowest possible cost, allowing only for the expense of distribution, with the understanding that they will make it up into garments for men in the service of the United States and the Allies.

They desire to reach the individual knitter direct that she may be unrestricted in the distribution of the finished garments, provided only that she knit solely for the above-mentioned cause and give her word of honor to that effect. They also gladly help out small organizations of recognized reputation working for patriotic purposes.

The Patriotic Yarn Association is located in Room 801, 225 Fourth Avenue, New York City. Miss Rosalind Wood is the president.

Mail orders are promptly filled. And samples and prices will be sent upon request.

When the Churches Cooperate

The simultaneous evangelistic campaign is now practically a whole-year program. The Atlanta Executive Committee has met for lunch once a week for six years. A leader is necessary, therefore someone must be on the job all the time, and think out plans in terms of the whole city and see that they are put into execution. The Chamber of Commerce would not be worth the cost of room-rent without a capable secretary. The Federation secretary is the chief strategist and the executive committee is the Board of Christian Strategy. In the large city he should be engaged for full time and should be the peer of any other recognized leaders, because his task is a difficult one. He must be the Christian statesman of the city.

This is a community task and must be upon the hearts and shoulders of the community men, the laymen. Ministers are not always men of the community. The average pastorate is three years. Ministers come and ministers go, but the laymen stay on. Laymen must accept larger responsibility. From the beginning there must be the combination of ministers and church members in the organization. It must be the whole church and all the churches in united action.

The example of Jesus makes it plain that it is not the business of the church to build itself out of the community, but to build up the community out of its own life. Too often ministers are used like mustard plasters. Apply them locally and leave them just so long as they draw. The official boards of churches and missionary superintendents have established wrong standards. Promotion depends on large congregations and contributions. Not a bigger church, but a better city is the new demand. The latter is the best guarantee for the former.

This does not necessarily mean the lack of interest in the denominational connection. It only makes that secondary. It is the team play of each for the victory of all. We may think of one denomination as the infantry, another as the cavalry, another as the artillery, another the aviation corps, another the engineering corps. Each unit of the division is important, but each must be subservient to the mission of the whole army. Only in this spirit can success be assured.

When the churches become Christian in their relation to one another, as they approach the community they will redeem the community—"Let no church seek its own, but each its neighbor's good."

A Record-Breaking Circuit "Rider"

WE all know something about the history of the early Methodist circuit-riders—the great distances many of them rode to fill their appointments. I want to give a record which will compare with that of Bishop Asbury. The man I have in mind is living now, in the state of Illinois. While Asbury crossed the Alleghany Mountains sixty times, and was said to have been in the saddle more than Napoleon Bonaparte, yet our friend, who is a humble pastor in the M. E. Church at Maunie, Ill., has made a record in the past six years not unworthy of comparison with any ever recounted. While the early Methodist itinerants won their fame on horseback, our friend made his record on foot. He has been in the ministry for only six years, but during that time he has walked, in order to fill his appointments, over fifteen thousand miles! This is not guesswork. He has kept a diary with all the accuracy of a United States census. Here are the figures for six years—20,000 miles traveled, 15,000 miles walked, 1,500 sermons, 100 funerals preached, longest circuit forty miles around, shortest circuit twenty miles, longest day's walk thirty-two miles and preached four times that day, shortest day's walk to fill regular appointments during the six year's ministry, nine miles. He not only walked to fill his regular Sunday appointments, but during revival meetings, for three weeks or more, he would often walk many miles per day. He never missed a single appointment on account of sickness. The first year of his ministry he received only $400, and gave away $100 of that to benevolent purposes. He is in perfect health—does not use stimulants of any kind. He was ordained by Bishop Charles W. Smith in 1913. He is married and has three children. His name is Rev. W. A. Sharp, Maunie, Ill. Can you beat the record?

Parent or Child Who Is to Blame?

We often hear parents complain of the bad habits developed by their children as though the children were at fault, when in reality the parents have no one to blame but themselves.

When a child is obedient, respectful, unselfish, sweet tempered, etc., it is because right methods of home training have been employed. And the reverse is equally true—disobedience, disrespect, selfishness, deceitfulness, and other undesirable characteristics in children are due to wrong methods in child training.

Not only are a child's habits, whether good or bad, due to the methods used by the parents, but the child's entire future depends upon the training received at home. Character is nothing more than an established set of habits.

The trouble has always been that we have never given any really scientific study to the question of child training—we have not searched for the cause of disobedience, the cause of wilfulness, the cause of untruthfulness, and of other symptoms which, if not treated in the right way, may lead to dire consequences. Instead, we punish the child for exhibiting the bad trait, or else "let it go." As a result, we do the child an actual wrong instead of helping it. What we should do is to attack the trouble at its source.

A New System

There is now a new system of child training which has completely revolutionized old methods, founded upon the principle that confidence is the basis of control.

Under this new system children who have been well nigh unmanageable become obedient and willing, and such traits as bashfulness, jealousy, fear, bragging, etc., are overcome. But the system goes deeper than that, for it instills high ideals and builds character, which is of course the goal of all parents' efforts in child training.

Physical punishment, shouted commands, and other barbarous relics of the old system have no place in this modern system. Children are made comrades, not slaves, are helped, not punished. And the results are nothing short of marvelous.

Instead of a hardship, child training becomes a genuine pleasure, as the parent shares every confidence, every joy and every sorrow of the child, and at the same time has its unqualified respect. This is a situation rarely possible under old training methods.

To put in practice these new ideas in child training, strange as it may seem, takes less time than the old method. It is simply a question of applying principles founded on a scientific study of human nature, going at it in such a way as to get immediate results without friction.

The founder of this new system is Professor Ray C. Beery, A.B., M.A. (Harvard and Columbia), who has written a complete Course in Practical Child Training. This Course is based on Professor Beery's extensive investigations and wide practical experience, and provides a well-worked-out plan which the parent can easily follow. The Parents Association, a national organization devoted to improving the methods of child training, has adapted the Beery system and is teaching the Course to its members by mail.

Nothing Else Like It

Membership in the Parents Association entitles you to a complete course of lessons in child training by Professor Beery. These lessons must not be confused with the hundreds of books on child training which leave the reader in the dark because of vagueness and lack of definite and practical application of the principles laid down. It does not deal in glittering generalities. Instead, it shows by concrete illustrations and detailed explanations exactly what to do to meet every emergency and how to accomplish immediate results and make a permanent impression. No matter whether your child is still in the cradle or is eighteen years old, this course will show how to apply the right methods at once. You merely take up the particular trait, turn to the proper page, and apply the lessons to the child. You are told exactly what to do. You cannot begin too soon, for the child's behavior in the first few years of life depends on the parent, not on the child.

This Book Free

"New Methods in Child Training" is the title of a little book which describes the work of the Parents Association and outlines Professor Beery's course in Practical Child Training. The association will gladly send a copy free on request.

If you are truly anxious to make the greatest possible success of your children's lives, you owe it to them to at least get this free book which shows how you may become a member of the Parents Association and secure the fine benefit of this wonderful new way in child training. Merely mail the coupon or a post card or letter, but do it today, as this offer may never be made again.

Moscow was in process, three armies advancing from as many directions. There was talk of moving the government from Moscow to Saratoff, 450 miles southeast, or to Nizhni-Novgorod, 266 miles northeast. The Germans were also advancing in the Ukraine. Leon Trotsky was reported on the same day to have asked the American military mission for ten American officers to assist him in organizing and training a new volunteer army, in which he was being assisted by former Russian officers. This army to be is variously estimated as from 300,000 to 750,000 men and it is to be held in readiness to assist the German people when they seek to throw off the imperial yoke. Trotsky also requested the services of American railroad engineers and transportation experts to reorganize the railways, and asked as well for American railway equipment, locomotives and cars.

The premier of Japan announced recently that no invasion of Russia had as yet been decided upon. Conferences were still being held at Tokyo on March 20 regarding the proposed expedition, and it was announced on March 21, that the Mikado would soon hold a crown council to decide the question of intervention. The Government party and the cabinet were reported as opposed to intervention.

WISCONSIN IS LOYAL. Senatorial primaries held in Wisconsin on March 19 resulted in the victory of representative Irvine L. Lenroot, Loyalist candidate for the Republican nomination for United States Senator, over James Thompson, who was handicapped by La Follette backing. In the Democratic primaries Joseph E. Davies outran his opponent more than 4 to 1. Victor Berger, having no opposition, was nominated as the Socialist candidate on a platform demanding the withdrawal of American soldiers from France. Wisconsin will meet the test again in the election on April 2.

HALF RATIONS OF WHEAT. The Food Administration announced, on March 23, that in order to meet the necessary requirements of the Allies and our army and navy, America must use no more than half of its normal consumption of wheat. Householders are asked not to use more than one and three-quarter pounds of wheat per person per week and bakers are asked to reduce the weight of loaves of Victory Bread from one pound to three-quarters of a pound. The use of wheat in the manufacture of anything other than food products is prohibited. There was said to be some hoarding of wheat, due to the agitation in Congress for a $2.50 price.

GIVE WINGS TO THREE BILLION DOLLARS. If it is true that "money has wings," it is equally certain that dollars must be spent if the American army is to control the air. The Aero Club of America on March 19 urged that the government's aircraft program be expedited by the immediate appropriation of $3,000,000,000, the appropriation at the last session of Congress of $640,000,000 being only a beginning.

The aviation section of the signal corps is to be increased to include 11,941 officers and 153,945 men. It is said to take two airplanes to train each aviator, and six planes to keep a man fighting for a year, with a spare motor for every motor in use. This means 80,000 airplanes and twice that number of motors, with more schools for aviators and mechanics. The aircraft program of America is said to be sixty days behind schedule, because of difficulty in securing needed materials, principally spruce timber. Activities of the I. W. W. having resulted in slower production, a total of only 12,500,000 feet was received to January 1 when 50,000,000 were required. The labor situation has been taken vigorously in hand, and production will be speeded up.

HERTLING DEFENDS TREATY. Chancellor von Hertling, addressing the Reichstag on March 18, declared that the Russian treaty contained "no conditions whatever which dishonor Russia, no mention of pressing war indemnities, no forcible appropriations of Russian territory. A number of the border states have severed their connection with the Russian state, in accordance with their own will, which was recognized by Russia. We have not contemplated and do not contemplate opposing the justified wishes and endeavor of Russia to liberate itself. If in the telegram from Washington it was thought fit to express to the Congress assembled at Moscow the sympathy of the United States at a moment when as it says the German power obtruded itself, in order to bring success to the battle for freedom, then I put that calmly aside with the rest." On the 18th the premiers and foreign ministers of the Entente nations assembled in London issued a protest against Germany's action, in the name of the German peace, toward the Russian people. The protest concluded: "Peace is loudly advertised, but under the disguise of verbal professions lurk the brutal realities of war and the untempered rule of a lawless force. Peace treaties such as these we do not and cannot acknowledge. Our ends are very different. We are fighting, and mean to continue fighting, in order to finish once and for all with this policy of plunder and to establish in its place the peaceful reign of organized justice."

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Henry D. Davison, chairman of the American Red Cross War Council, told the Associated Press in Paris, on March 18, that the American Red Cross was prepared to keep the soldiers in touch with their families and to look after the business interests of soldiers which they did not have time to attend to before entering the service, securing the appointment of guardians, taking care of mortgages, paying taxes, and taking care of legal procedures that become necessary. The Naval Committee of the House, on March 19, reported the Naval Appropriation Bill, carrying a total of $1,327,600,000, larger by over $800,000,000 than any prior naval bill. The bill authorizes an increase in the strength of the navy from 87,000 to 180,000 men, and provides for the carrying forward of the three-year construction program of dreadnoughts, battle cruisers, and other large ships which had been temporarily sidetracked for the rapid construction of destroyers and other small craft needed for anti-submarine operations. While the Pacific made the first splash, the Atlantic was not far behind, the first wooden ship built for Uncle Sam on the eastern coast being launched at Kearny, N. J., on March 20. Six hundred calkers, chippers, riggers and riveters went on strike on March 19, at the shipyard of the Baltimore Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company. The men were working on mine sweepers for the navy and merchant ships. They struck for more pay, asking $10.56 a day for chippers and calkers. An explosion in a grenade depot at La Courneuve, north of Paris, on March 15, caused the death of 16 persons. The state of Delaware, by a vote of 13 to 3 in the Senate, on March 18, became the ninth state to ratify the National Prohibition amendment. Henry Ford urges America to "Fight for peace; and do it in such a manner that the whole world will understand that we mean business and that we are in it with all of our hearts and souls until the finish." In line with this sentiment he suggests the building of fast small tanks that could be easily handled, could be built in large numbers and operated by a small crew. Premier Alhucemas of Spain, who, after resigning on March 9, was persuaded by King Alfonso to continue in office, again resigned on March 19. Former Premier of Spain, Antonio Maura, succeeded, on March 22, in forming a new cabinet. The cabinet includes four former premiers, Dato, as Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Romanones as Minister of Justice and Alhucemas as Minister of the Interior. President Wilson, on March 19, took steps to coordinate the work of the war industries board, the railroads, the food and fuel administration and the shipping board in a way to eliminate conflicts in priority orders covering freight shipments. On March 18, American Secret Service agents arrested in New York two women and two men who were supposed to be important members of an international spy system operating in this and Allied countries in the interest of Germany. All of the persons arrested were wanted in France, where most of them hold their citizenship, and where they will be tried on charges of treason. American law did not permit so serious a charge. The authorities recommended the deportation of the quartette as undesirable aliens, and by order of the President they will be turned over to the tender mercies of the French Republic. Committee, on March 20, issued a favorable report on the Overman bill, empowering the President to make necessary reorganizations within the administrative departments of the government. The committee was deadlocked on the bill for a number of weeks, and its final report was looked upon as another triumph for the Chief Executive. . . . German agents operating in Beluchistan were reported, on March 20, to have succeeded in instigating a revolt of the natives, the Kohtrans, cutting telephone wires, firing on trains, destroying government property, and attacking two British posts. They were repulsed with many casualties, but their attitude was said to be still aggressive. Beluchistan is between India, and Persia, and is a British protectorate with an area of 132,000 square miles and a population of about 1,050,000.

ALTHOUGH the first reports of the fighting had to do with the neighborhood of Cambrai, the main attack was south and west of St. Quentin, where the enemy took the village of Essigny before midday on the 21st and reached the Crozat Canal by nightfall. Here he was held, and the intense pressure was shifted northward driving toward Moncy, ten miles west of St. Quentin, where a narrow wedge was finally driven into the British lines, sometime on Friday, but at fearful cost. Desperate fighting followed, the British several times retaking towns and positions temporarily lost, but ultimately the British lines north and south of this wedge were withdrawn, until Peronne was passed and the defenders were at last in position behind the Somme.

Meantime the former salient, the result of last November's attack toward Cambrai, was the center of a wicked fight. Here the British withdrew under incessant attack until their line ran west of Croisilles, St. Leger, Mory, and Vaux, east of Bapaume, swinging southeast to Gouzeaucourt and Nurlu, then bending sharply westward to Bouchevignes and then south to the Somme and west to Peronne. This line held against all assaults throughout the fourth day of battle, and was still holding as dawn broke for the fifth day's struggle.

The German official bulletin, of March 25, referred to the advance as a great victory, claiming to have defeated the British, and announcing the capture of 45,000 troops, 600 guns and 300 machine-guns. The British, however, while admitting the terrible impact of the staggering blow they had received, remained confident of the ultimate defeat of the enemy and called attention to the objectives as yet unachieved. Maps taken from captured officers showed that the plans contemplated an advance all along the line of 8 kilometers the first day, 12 the second day and 20 the third, a total of about 24 miles. At the end of the fourth day, he had gained an average of about ten miles, with an extreme penetration of about fifteen miles at one point near Peronne, and was being strongly held along the whole line. Also it was pointed out that the British had as yet used few reinforcements, the divisions originally in the lines fighting the successive rear-guard actions by which the enemy's advance was made so costly that estimates of his probable losses ranged from 30% to 40% of the forces engaged or in the neighborhood of 350,000.

The Germans attempted to smother the English batteries with gas, but the British were ready and the gas found few victims, although it forced upon the gunners the handicap of working in masks.

ACCORDING to a correspondent of the Associated Press, the hardest fighting of Saturday occurred east of Peronne, in Genlis Wood. Here the line swayed between the opposing forces all day, a British counter-attack, late in the afternoon, restoring the positions, which were afterward given up as the line was withdrawn behind the Somme.

According to the correspondent the Germans brought up 110 new batteries,

. . . The President signed the Daylight Saving Bill on March 19. . . . A measure was introduced in the Senate on March 21, which would give the government power to requisition, in war time, any property, real or personal, of any citizen, compensation to be fixed by competent authority. . . . President Wilson, on March 21, issued a proclamation providing for participation in the war by persons whose religious creed forbids fighting. They are to be assigned to the medical, quartermaster's and engineer's corps. . . . Austria on March 20 made new demands on Rumania, asking the surrender of all territory west of a line from east of Red Tower Pass to the Danube near Ghilmarar. This would give Austria all the passes through the former mountain barrier along the old frontier. . . . The Senate voted 49 to 78, on totaling 700 guns on one short section of the front.

The attack on the first day was under cover of a fog, which enabled the assaulting columns to approach close to the British lines before, machine-guns could be concentrated on them, and which also made difficult the work of the airmen. Where No Man's Land was wide, the fog hindered the attack; but on the whole it was an advantage. On the succeeding days the visibility improved.

"The enemy's gunfire," quoting this correspondent, "destroyed much of the British wire, and the rest was forced by sheer weight of human bodies. The front and support lines were smashed into a confused mass of earth, and the German storm troops took them without much delay. They were lightly held, and the English and Scottish battalions fell back in good order on the main battle-line. The enemy's waves still came on, mown down by the British machine-guns and by the field artillery, firing with open sights. Their dead and wounded were piled up in heaps, but this did not check for long the dense masses that followed for further sacrifice."

"Near Ephehy, a company of Leicesters held Vaucelette Farm, though entirely surrounded they would not surrender and were either killed or captured."

Similar strong points, heavily armed and supplied with food and munitions for two days, held out to the limit and greatly delayed the German advance, enfilading the columns marching toward the front and selling themselves dearly. Some of these rear-guards cut their way through to the British lines.

IN Paris the attack was welcomed in that it ended suspense. It was said that in political circles the making of the attack was taken to indicate that the internal position of Germany was less satisfactory than had been pretended and that the enemy had been forced to put destiny to the test. However, it was held that the four months' delay had given the Allies ample time to prepare. Nothing but confidence in the ultimate outcome was expressed, although it was admitted that the battle would be long and desperate.

LONDON faced the crisis soberly doggedly. One result of the attack was to end the bickering of some of the labor unions over further drafts of men for the front. While some retirements had been expected, the average Londoner was not prepared for the extent of the British retreat before the German impact. The breaking of the line before St. Quentin and of the second battle-line east of Peronne left the British public gravely anxious. It was apparent that the strategy of the German High Command was aimed at the driving of a wedge between the armies defending the channel ports and those defending Paris, an end, which if attained, would justify whatever gigantic losses it might cost.

The German reference to the defeat of American reserves was unexplained by any official reports from General Pershing, although Washington cabled for full information.

The reference to American reserves in the German communications of Sunday March 21, to make the 1918 wheat price $2.50 per bushel. . . . Railway Director McAdoo, on March 21, created a division of capital expenditures to decide upon the necessity of all new extensions, terminals and equipment. . . . The Fuel Administration on March 21 announced a zone system for coal distribution by which the industries of each section of the country will be served by the mines nearest them, eliminating unnecessary long hauls. . . . The seized Dutch ships will be armed, manned by American naval crews and put to work carrying grain to the Allies. . . . American dye manufacturers have at last satisfactorily solved the secret of properly producing synthetic indigo and America will therefore be forever free from dependence upon German dye factories for this important color.

was explained by the announcement, on March 25, that American engineers had rendered efficient and valuable transportation service to the British armies. There was also a suggestion that an American division might be included in the mobile reserves under command of the Supreme War Council and might therefore be in action.

MONDAY, March 25, began with the Germans fighting for the crossings of the Somme between Peronne and Ham, and for possession of the ruins which were once the city of Bapaume, about which so much desperate fighting centered in the Battle of the Somme. The German official bulletin for March 25 claimed the capture of Bapaume and of Nesle seven miles west of Ham, and told of fierce fighting for the possession of Combles, midway between Bapaume and Peronne. General Haig's reports told of fresh attacks northward and southward of Bapaume, but did not indicate any further withdrawal there, while the bodies of German troops which had crossed the Somme between Liecourt and Brie were reported as having been driven back. The German attacks around Bapaume according to General Haig were stopped by rifle, machine-gun and artillery fire and the enemy was driven back with great loss.

Other reports gave color to the German claim regarding possession of Nesle, as the British and French, the French having taken over a portion of the line, were reported as counter-attacking, but successfully, between Nesle and Ham.

President Wilson sent this message to General Haig, on March 25, "May I not express to you my warm admiration of the splendid steadfastness and valor with which your troops have withstood the German onset and the perfect confidence all Americans feel that you will win a secure and final victory."

While this battle was in progress, German artillery was intensely active along the whole front from the sea to Switzerland, especially near Ypres, on the Aisne, near Rheims in the Champagne, and at Verdun. The French completely defeated German "shock" troops attacking near Nomeny in Lorraine, and near Souain in the Champagne country; and, in hand-to-hand fighting, drove the enemy back after he had attacked and penetrated some positions between Caurieres Wood and Bezonvaux, north of Verdun. The Italian front also saw heavy fighting on March 24.

Reports from Rome, on March 25, told of great concentrations of men and guns by the Austrians in apparent preparation for another drive on Italy, perhaps to be made simultaneously with the drive on the west.

A German general Auffenberg is reported in Copenhagen dispatches of the same date as stating that "the present offensive is only a link in the great offensive," that "the most violent fighting will be near Verdun," and that "important things should happen in Italy."

A GERMAN attack near Blemeray in the Woivre, on Mar. 23, was broken up by the French fire and, on March 24, a German attack on the French south of Juvincourt was repulsed. On the 21st as the Germans were attacking west of Cambrai the Canadians launched a gas attack near Lens, using 5,000 drums of poison gas. This was followed by an intense bombardment, which swept through the gassed areas. No infantry attack was made.

For days before the 21st, the aviation sections of the opposing forces struggled for mastery of the air. The advantage remained with the Allies, and the German blow found the British expecting it both as to time and place.

As a prelude to the grand assault German torpedo boats and destroyers, on March 21, bombarded the French port of Dunkirk. English and French destroyers engaged the enemy and sank two destroyers and two torpedo boats. One English destroyer was damaged but made port. The German admiralty admitted the loss of two ships.

Strikes, demanding peace, are again spreading in Austria.

Hudson Maxim on Long Range Guns

Hudson Maxim, one of America's highest authorities on ordnance, holds that the mystifying reports of shell fire directed on Paris from a distance of 75 miles is not necessarily a fabric of imagination, but that the construction of a gun capable of that feat is possible. He estimates the length of the gun at 100 feet and length of the powder chamber 30 feet. Popular Science Monthly, in a recent issue, stated that plans had been drawn for a monster gun 375 feet long and with a bore of 60 inches. This giant weapon would have a range of 100 miles and fire a shell 26½ feet long, weighing 100 tons.

Helping Farmers— To Save Time and Energy and Make Money

That motor cars are absolutely necessary for farmers as business equipment is shown by the fact—

That more than half of the Overland output is taken by farmers.

That the Overland is completely qualified to be fully satisfactory for farmers is proven by the fact—

That more than half of all Overland cars built are taken by farmers.

You need a car and that car should be an Overland.

It is not necessary to pay more than the Overland price—and complete satisfaction cannot be bought for less.

At a low cost and for economical maintenance, Model 90 gives power, prodigious power, from its perfected frugal-with-fuel motor.

It is simple to handle, has narrow turning radius, and easily operating clutch.

It is comfortable, with spacious interior, wide seats, deep upholstery, rear cantilever springs, 106-inch wheelbase, and large tires, non-skid rear.

It has Auto-Lite starting and lighting and vacuum fuel system.

To pay less is to risk the loss of efficiency, comfort, modernized improvements, beauty of design or long-lived service.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily Prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

GOING to God for a lost world must precede going to a lost world for God." Under the inspiration of this quotation The Great Commission Prayer League is issuing a call to all Christians to unite in prayer for a world-wide revival. They urge all children of God to besiege the throne of grace for an outpouring of the Spirit "upon the entire body of Christ," and their plan is for daily prayer with special intercession on the first Sunday of each month and during the first week of each quarter. No one would question the world-wide need of redeeming grace. Only the Spirit of God in the hearts of men can make the world truly safe for democracy. Prayer for universal obedience to the Divine will is therefore a highly spiritual and truly patriotic exercise of Christian privilege. We have no hesitation in recommending that the Christian Herald Prayer League join wholeheartedly in this prayer for world-wide revival.

I. M. again asks prayer for the conversion of a very dear friend, for God's blessing upon this friendship, for divine help in the institution of a home, and for vigorous health for herself and other members of her family.

R. N. D. tells the Prayer League about God's gift of eight sons and three daughters, two of whom were called home, and all of whom were consecrated by both parents to the service and call of God. All are members of the church and two have offered themselves for special missionary service. R. N. D. asks that God may accept them, that they may enter joyfully into the field or place that He shall assign them, and that there may be a great revival of God's Church in the world.

Mr. and Mrs. R. M. G. write: "Will you add your prayers to ours that the little daughter whose picture we are enclosing may be made whole?" She is seven years old, but has never walked or talked and is not able to sit up without help, but seems normal in other ways. They also pray that their struggling church, the only American one in the village, may be strengthened.

Mr. and Mrs. R. H. R. write from the republic of Honduras in Central America to tell of a direct and unmistakable answer to prayer.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. H., missionaries to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians in Oklahoma, ask the prayers of God's people for (1) an interpreter in their Cheyenne Indian work; (2) a revival of interest on the part of the Christian Indians, and for the unsaved to come to church; (3) bodily healing for a daughter, and (4) for a grandson. They give thanks for the return and conversion of a wandering son.

"One Who Prays," a young married woman, asks the prayers of the League for the healing of her husband, who is suffering from tuberculosis of the throat. She tells of a wonderful answer to prayer in the case of a child who was given up by the doctors, and makes bold to ask a similar manifestation of divine mercy in her husband's case.

Mrs. L. J. B. prays for bodily healing for her brother-in-law, and for the conversion of her son-in-law, her husband, and her husband's brother; also for the Sunday school that they are thinking of starting in the neighborhood.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Keefeton, Okla.; Scranton, Texas; Oswego, Kan.; Staplehurst, Neb.; Maywood, Neb.; Columbia Falls, Mont.; McCune, Kan.; Calgary, Canada; Georgetown, Me.; Addison, N. Y. (that many may be saved during revival); Randleman, N. C. (that many may be saved during revival); Minneapolis, Minn. (that many may be saved during revival); Aspinwall, Pa. (that many may be saved during revival); Goldsboro, N. C. (that many may be saved during revival); Aurora, Ill. (at the First Congregational Church); Gainesville, Ga. (that many may be saved during revival held at the Baptist church); G. W. H., Calumet, Okla. (for a revival of interest on the part of our Christian Indians in their church duties and for the unsaved to come to church); M. J. B. (for the conversion of twenty); Rockford, Ohio (that a class of young men may be saved); Prescott, Canada (for a revival throughout Canada and the British Empire); Honesdale, Pa. (that the saloons may be closed); A. T. C., North Leverett, Mass. (that a pastor may be sent to the North Sunderland Baptist church); Mrs. M. J. J., Island Creek, Md. (that a minister may be sent back to the church); Mrs. G. W. H., Chambersburg, Pa. (that a minister may be sent).

Five parents ask prayer that sons' minds may be restored; two friends, that their mothers' minds may be restored; A Reader, that husband's mind may be restored; twenty, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

Mrs. A. G. asks prayer that son's eyes may be healed; Mrs. O. I. A., that husband's and own sight may be restored; Mrs. J. J., that a growth near eye may be cured; Mrs. W. R. M., that sight may be restored without an operation; M. J. and Mrs. H. C. Y., that their mothers' sight may be restored; two wives, their husbands'; twelve friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives or friends.

Twelve friends ask prayer for the restoration of hearing for friends, relatives or themselves.

Twenty-one friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Sixty-one friends ask prayers for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Three parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. M. J. H., that husband and sons may be cured of the liquor habit; five wives, that their husbands may be cured of the liquor habit; four, that friends and relatives may be cured of the liquor habit.

Four parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the tobacco habit; two wives, their husbands; L. B. C., that three men may be cured of the smoking habit; M. J. B., that father may be cured of the tobacco habit.

One hundred and twenty-five friends ask prayer for healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. R. P. R., that mother may be restored to health and regain the use of limbs; Mr. and Mrs. H. G. J., that son may be cured of impediment of speech; M. M., that husband may be cured without an operation; A. E. T., that pastor's health may be restored; Mrs. S. G., that a friend may be cured of cancer; ninety-six, for healing for themselves, including Mrs. G. M. S., to regain the use of limbs; C. B. W., that a growth on jaw may be removed; M. C., to be cured of stammering; Mrs. S. E. A., to regain the use of limbs.

Thirty-six parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; including L. M., that sons may be saved and return safe from the army; twenty-six wives, their husbands; forty-eight friends, for the conversion of relatives or friends.

Forty friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Thirty-one friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including five friends requesting prayer for world-wide peace; Miss M. K. S., for rain at Corpus Christi, Texas.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. F. J. B., Fergus Falls, Minn.; F. H., Atlanta, Ga.; Mrs. G. C. S., Jet, Okla.; S. E. L., Roxbury, Mass.; Mrs. C. E. S., Allen, Pa.; Mrs. A. M., Bolette, N. D.; S. S., Martel, Ohio; Mrs. H. C. What the Norwesco Laboratories Have Done For American Motorists

NOT until science invaded the automobile field did the motor car come into its own. Chemistry held the great master key. Out of the test tube came steel of greater strength; rubber of greater resiliency and longer life; aluminum, light, strong, and flawless—materials of such quality as only science could produce.

So, then, it is to the chemical laboratory that the world owes the automobile of ultra efficiency. But science did not stop there. It provided the means of maintaining this great efficiency.

In the Norwesco Laboratories, Frederick R. Hall, motorist and chemist, surrounded by a group of able associates, produced a line of automobile utilities that are Chemically Correct—efficient, safe, thoroughly dependable—

NORWESCO

The Chemically Correct Line

First of Norwesco utilities to prove its worth to motorists was Se-Ment-Ol—the radiator cement—that “Finds the Leak and Fixes It.”

Motorists have used 1,308,937 cans of Se-Ment-Ol. They know it as the certain cure for leaking radiators—they know it cannot injure hose connections, radiators or water-jackets—they know it is quick, sure as solder—and far cheaper.

Like Se-Ment-Ol, each Norwesco product is a known quantity—a product you can rely on. Chemically Correct!

Probably your dealer carries Norwesco products. But if you cannot get them in your community, check the coupon for the articles you want and enclose retail price with it, giving the name of your hardware and accessory dealer.

Our 24-page booklet, “The Proper Care of Your Car” will interest you. Mail the coupon for a copy.

THE NORTHWESTERN CHEMICAL CO.

Cleans the rust, scale and lime out of radiator and water-jackets. Makes your cooling system 100% efficient again. Has no caustic action—cannot injure radiator or hose connections.
Price: U. S., 75c. Canada, 90c.

NORWESCO Top Dressings

Make Old Tops Look New
For leather and Pantasote. Waterproofs and preserves the top—restores the original color—makes the fabric soft, pliable and durable. It penetrates—will not rub off, crack or chip. Fine for upholstery. Price: U. S., pints, 75c; quarts, $1.25. Canada, $1.00 and $1.65.

For Mohair Tops

A special Norwesco dressing for Mohair tops and all top linings. Makes them fresh and new-looking again. Price: U. S., pints, 75c; quarts, $1.25. Canada, $1.00 and $1.65.

UTILITY BLACK

Brings the New-Look Back
Dries in one hour, hard and glossy. Use it on body, fenders, hood, radiator, top bows—any place where there are scratches to cover or mars to hide. Fine for under side of fenders—keeps rust away. Price: U. S., half pints, 60c; pint, $1.00. Canada, 80c and $1.35.

NORWESCO Valve Grinding Compound

Insures Pressure-tight Valves
Easy to work with. Gives an efficient, tight valve—a smooth, even seat—with less work and trouble. Contains no ground glass or emery. Consistency always the same. Price: U. S., 4 oz. double end can, 40c; 1 lb. can for shop use, $1.00. Canada, 50c and $1.20.

SONG STORIES OF THE SAWDUST TRAIL

By HOMER RODEHEAVER
Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

YOU can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ.

Homer Rodeheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail."

Rody, in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing the four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. He relates how another song, "My Father Watches Over Me," sung at a mission service, called a poor, sick, criminal and wanderer back to Christ and happiness. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associates, to his wife and family, and tells how all his former happiness was restored.

We will send a copy of "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $240

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $200

AFTER DEATH, WHAT?

By REV. MADISON C. PETERS

WHEN the late Dr. Klopsch published "After Death, What?" some years ago, the book was received with tremendous enthusiasm and the editions published by him were soon exhausted. Successive editions were not published, yet the demand through the intervening years has been large. For this reason we have thought it wise to bring out an entirely new edition of this wonderful book.

It is impossible to give more than the briefest glimpses of the rich character of the contents of this attractive volume. Among the subjects discussed are: "Does Death End All?" "Light After Darkness," "The Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "Heavenly Reunions," "The Joy and Comfort of Faith in Immortality," "Occupations in Heaven," "Our Children in Heaven," and many others, including poems of comfort and master minds on the life beyond. In addition to the above masterpieces of thought and literature, it contains a vast collection of golden gems from the greatest historians, philosophers, preachers and poets of all ages and nationalities on other phases of the future life.

We will send a copy of "After Death, What?" postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for $235 one year, for.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $200

CAP'N ABE, STOREKEEPER A CAPE COD STORY

By JAMES A. COOPER

DO you like to read about doings on Cape Cod, among the quaint characters who inhabit that locality? Would you like to read of what happened to a high-bred city girl when she suddenly landed down there to take up her living with a relative she had never seen? Would you like to read how loquacious Cap'n Abe, the storekeeper, who could tell more marvelous yarns than any other man on the Cape, suddenly disappeared, and of how his brother from "furrin parts" appeared to take his place?

Would you like to read about a most perplexing mystery that came near being turned into a tragedy, and of how a man who was a rank coward at heart forced himself to play the part of a hero? In this volume, humor and pathos are well mixed. Many of the doings along the Cape shore are taken from life. Tender love scenes are not lacking; and there is high excitement when a great storm wrecks a vessel off the coast and it looks as if some of the loved ones might be drowned.

To meet Cap'n Abe, is never to forget him.

We will send a copy of "Cap'n Abe, Storekeeper," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald $250 for one year, for.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $200

Young People's Topics for April 14

How to Enjoy Sunday

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics, Isa. 58: 5-14

THERE was a time when the full measure of the old Pharisaic law of the Sabbath seemed to have engrafted itself upon the evangelical churches of Christendom. Sunday became not only a day of worship but a day of terror to all whose spirits called for action. Christ himself, however, said that the Sabbath was made for man. He and his disciples paid little attention to the man-made ordinances with which the Sabbath was hedged about. The Christian Church from early centuries ceased to celebrate the Jewish Sabbath, celebrating instead the Lord's Day, the anniversary of the resurrection of the Saviour. As Christians, we should keep this Lord's day as unto him. In proclaiming the Sabbath, it was written that the Lord rested on the Sabbath day, and that, therefore, he blessed and sanctified it. The Christian Sunday, while it is governed by grace and not by law, can only be blessed when it is sanctified to the service of the Saviour. Anything that we can do in his name it is well to do on Sunday. Anything in the doing of which we would feel ourselves condemned if Christ should suddenly appear in our midst, should be left undone. This is indeed the only rule which we can state that would stand against all argument.

There is no reason for Sunday to be a dry and somber day. Worship it must have, but worship should be the happiest act of the week, for in worship our souls commune with the Father, through the sacrifice of the Son, and by the revelation of his Spirit. From worship we can readily pass to acts of kindness, for these can certainly be done in his name. And worship may also include hours spent in the out-of-doors, where we can become acquainted with the Creator through the things he has made. Sunday should be a day of rest, through recreation, through the doing of things worth while; a day for the reunion of old friendships, for the renewing of old faiths, and for the recreating of the spirit of devotion within us. Anything that serves these ends is well done on Sunday, and, it might be added, on any other day of the week.

Factions in League Life

Epworth League Topic, I Cor. 3: 1-10

HUMAN vanity and the ungodly desire for personal preferment have wrecked more worthy enterprises than the world knows of. There is no place in the spirit of Christianity for factions of any nature or degree, but Christianity from the beginning has found frail human nature handicapping it by bickerings and petty strife. Before the Church had passed the half-century mark Paul found it necessary to warn the Corinthians against this very thing, and he told them that it was carnal, in other words sinful. We cannot be true Christians until we are willing to be less than nothing for his sake, until we are ready to be set at naught for him, to be despised and misrepresented, and to take it cheerfully for his sake. The cause is everything, the individual is nothing. It makes no difference whether John Smith or William Brown is elected president of the League so long as he is thoroughly consecrated to the service of the Saviour. It may be that some who wanted Smith will be disappointed in the election of Brown, but the election once over friends of both must rally around the successful candidate and yield to him all of their enthusiasm and ability in spiritual power in order that the great thing, the work of the League, may go forward. An ambition to be chairman of a committee, charged with important business, is a worthy ambition, unless it carries with it the refusal to serve on the committee at all except as chairman. When a Leaguer can work with equal enthusiasm in the cabinet or in the kitchen, real service for the Kingdom may be expected at his hands. Neither wealth, nor birth, nor education, nor friends, nor any other creature, can fit a Leaguer for leadership. Only the spirit of Christ in the heart can so prepare him, and if thus prepared, he will be used of God, and no factions or divisions will impair his usefulness.

Preaching to a Burglar

ONE of the speakers at the recent opening service of the New York Evangelistic Committee was Bill Hoffer, watchman in a suburban factory now, but who a few years ago was an improvident, careless, impious mechanic in the Bronx. He told how he had strolled into a meeting and heard that which changed the current of his life. Not long afterward he changed his business because of its associations, and became a watchman in a jewelry factory. After he had been there for several months, he heard one night the sound of a window being forced and he investigated. He found a window raised and a man climbing in. The burglar was balanced across the window-sill when Bill called out:

"Young fellow, if you were right with God you would not be breaking in here tonight to rob this place!"

The watchman paused to let his words sink in and also to let his burglar look up and see that there was a revolver back of the warning. Bill had his man thoroughly covered. The burglar had a pistol too, but it was in his hip pocket and could not be reached without relinquishing his hold on the window casing and taking a fall.

"You had better get right with God," Bill continued, "or you will land in jail."

Again a pause to let the words have due effect, and then the watchman told the burglar his own story. Memories of home were awakened, although the gun was not lowered, for Bill did not intend that his congregation should leave while he was preaching. The young fellow's eyes filled with tears, and he told the watchman of a good mother at home who had tried to bring him up right. Finally, under the direction of the watchman, the burglar uttered a prayer, promised to reform and was permitted to depart.

Of course, the reader expects that it was a case of "when the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be"; but letters have come from a city in the western part of New York state, telling of a fellow who now has a good job and is the pride of his mother and is, somehow, very happy over it all. The young worker is none other than Bill Hoffer's burglar, transformed by grace.

A Cargo of Oil for Palmolive

How Africa Helps Make Palmolive

THE making of Palm Oil is a native industry in the African jungles where oil-bearing palms grow. Natives gather the palm nuts and prepare the oil. They transport it to trading stations in huge cargo canoes.

The oil produced by these primitive methods is a natural cleansing agent, essential to Palmolive quality. Palmolive owes its mild, creamy, profuse lather and its wholesome, natural color to the Palm and Olive oils from which it is made.

They have made the most popular toilet soap in the world—

PALMOLIVE SOAP

Palmolive Shampoo is also made from these same historic ingredients, prized since the days of ancient Egypt. It is liquid Palmolive, with the same mild yet thorough cleaning qualities.

Palmolive is sold everywhere by leading dealers—war-time price, two cakes for 25 cents. It is supplied in the guest-room size at the best hotels.

Send 25 cents in stamps for the Palmolive week-end case, containing miniature packages of eight popular Palmolive Specialties attractively packed. Address

A battery of British heavy howitzers in action against the German hordes

AT the beginning of the second week of the great western offensive, the Germans had not gained any strategic victory, although their "drive" had carried them forward at certain points. Every foot of ground was won at terrible cost. As the week closed, the Allies were holding their lines firmly everywhere and at several points had made distinct and even important gains. There was a powerful German drive in the Arras sector, where on March 28 seven divisions of the enemy made a furious assault. They were stubbornly held and repulsed.

Montdidier, 36 miles west of St. Quentin, was taken by the German army of the Crown Prince on March 27. Beyond Montdidier, the invaders were checked and driven back.

East of Montdidier, at Noyon, the French not only held their line against strong attacks, but in counter-attacks they gained and firmly held a mile and a half on a six-mile front. This situation may become one of immense importance. The Allies are in great force on both sides of the German wedge, and the British and French reserve—a great army held for the opportune moment to strike—is ready to be utilized, should the time be favorable for the counter-offensive.

It was definitely announced, on March 29, that General Foch would assume supreme command of the Allied armies in France and Flanders, and that he would direct the Allied answer to the German challenge.

The Story of the Battle

AS we went to press last week the German drive was in its fifth day. The Germans had just entered Bapaume and the battle for the crossings of the Somme was at its height, with British and French counter-attacks driving the Germans back between Nesle and Roye.

The Germans threw forward immense masses of men on both sides of Nesle, and on the night of the fifth day of fighting, March 25, Nesle, Guiseard to the south of Nesle, and some smaller villages farther to the east were evacuated by the British and French, whose troops took up positions on the heights commanding the shell-torn towns. By exerting tremen-

Allies and Americans Confidently Prepared for the Great Counterblow—Frightful Hun Losses

Pershing Speaks for the Nation

GENERAL PERSHING thus placed himself under General Foch's command. "I come to say to you that the American people would hold it a great honor for our troops were they engaged in the present battle. I ask it of you, in my name and in that of the American people. There is at this moment no other question than that of fighting. Infantry, artillery, aviation—all that we have—are yours to dispose of as you will. Others are coming, which are as numerous as will be necessary. I have come to say to you that the American people would be proud to be engaged in the greatest battle in history."

dous and overwhelming pressure in the fight for the bridgehead across the Somme at Ham, the enemy finally succeeded in crossing the river during the fifth day of fighting. Farther north British artillery smashed bridge after bridge and raft after raft, with which the Germans essayed to make the crossing; numbers here as elsewhere finally won forward, but at fearful cost. On the evening of the fifth day, the Allied line, straightened out by some further withdrawals of troops which had held their ground, left the old battle-line north of Wancourt, passed west of Croisilles, Mory, Bapaume, east of Combles, crossed the Somme a little west of Peronne, held the west bank of the river as far south as Brie, then passed west of Nesle, Guiseard and Chauny, joining the former battle-line again in the southern part of the forest of St. Gobain, slightly to the north of Anizy. All of this day a terrific struggle continued on the old battle-ground of the Somme, fought over in 1916, for the possession of the village of Longueval. Similar battles of masses against men marked the fighting near Ervillers, south of Croisilles, and at Nesle. Ervillers finally fell into German hands, and at Longueval a deep salient was driven into the British lines.

There was, however, in all this fierce fighting evidence that the Germans were growing weary. In spite of the fact that the British troops who had been fighting already for four days were still fighting and weary themselves, the German penetrations with each hour of the battle grew less, and sector after sector of the British line was holding against all assaults.

The Germans were still replacing weary men with fresh troops, but the width of front on which they were maintaining their intense pressure was gradually narrowing. Gen. Pershing, on March 25, announced that two regiments of American engineers were fighting with the British and French, and later reports indicated that one American division, some 27,000 men, was operating with the French reserves.

The Germans, on March 26, announced that penetration of the British trenches near St. Quentin had been made by their new tanks, supported by some captured British tanks.

ON the sixth day of fighting the old battle-front from which the British drive of 1916 was started was reached in two or three places, and the Germans pressing westward from Bapaume reached within striking distance of Albert, which they took that evening. As the fighting of the seventh day began, the line north of the Somme left the original battle-line at the Scarpe River, passed west of Monchy, through Wancourt, Henin Boiry, Beaumont-Hamel, west of Albert, and through Bray to the Somme. South of the river the British lines were drawn back to conform to the lines on the north. Through the whole of the sixth day terrific fighting occurred in the neighborhood of Chaulnes, between Nesle and Roye, and on both sides of Noyon. Although maintaining his pressure all along the line the enemy was unable to attain driving force except in the direction of Roye and about Albert, where the British toward the end of the day were driven back to positions on the hills commanding the towns. French troops cooperating with British also fell back to the hills commanding Noyon, and on these hills the Allied troops stood fast. The Germans strove insistently to drive out from Albert, and also made desperate efforts to go on from Roye in the direction of Amiens, their evident purpose being both to defeat the British armies and to drive a wedge between the British and French. After six days of fighting the British were still undefeated, the line was not broken, but only moving backward. The British had not yet used their reserves; while though the French had taken over part of the battle-line, their reserves also were practically untouched. The Germans had driven forward in such a way as to expose both flanks to attack, their left flank being especially vulnerable because the British held the famous Vimy Ridge, north of the Scarpe, the eastward bulwark of Arras. The German High Command itself evidently realized the insecurity of their positions for they announced, on March 27, "The enemy holds strong reserves south of the penetrated front with which to attack our troops from the flank." And Ludendorff was quoted as saying: "Victory has been won but no one can foresee what will result from it."

BUT on the seventh day the line held. The Germans, after a succession of determined assaults on Ablainville and Buequoy, west of Bapaume, won only a meager foothold in the village of Ablainville. On both sides of Albert and south to the Somme, they exerted all their power to force the crossing of the Ancre Brook. South of Albert the British at first fell back, but late in the day they drove forward and in this counter-attack retook the villages of Morlancourt and Chipilly north of the Somme and the village of Proyart south of the river. The end of the seventh day found Haig's troops holding the strongest line they had held since they began to retreat before the German masses.

Berlin's report of the same day's fighting could only state that "On both banks of the Somme, our armies are engaged in a slowly progressive attack."

All through the night of the sixth day and the bright sunshine of the seventh, the British airmen were busy bombing and machine-gunning the German troops encamped in the open fields and woods. They reported the roads clogged with men and guns and the fields black with German troops. German airmen bombed Amiens and neighboring villages.

PREMIER LLOYD GEORGE, on March 27 sent a message to Lord Reading, British High Commissioner in America, which was made public in New York. The Premier said: "We are at the crisis of the war. Attacked by an immense superiority of German troops, our army has been forced to retire. The retirement has been carried out methodically before the presence of a steady succession of fresh German reserves, which are suffering enormous losses. . . . The dogged pluck of our troops has for the moment checked the ceaseless onrush of the enemy. . . . But this battle, the greatest and most momentous in the history of the world, is only

British dugouts before St. Quentin, where the first blow of the German attack was struck just beginning. Throughout it the French and British are buoyed with the knowledge that the great Republic of the West will neglect no effort which can hasten its troops and its ships to Europe. In war, time is vital. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of getting American reinforcements across the Atlantic in the shortest possible space of time."

From several other sources have come expressions indicating the urgent need for an early victory of immediate action by America on a large scale. General Leonard Wood, just recently back from France, told the Senate Military Affairs Committee, on March 25, that in his opinion the British and French would be able to hold the German attack and to regain the lost ground. He expressed the opinion that to be of tangible assistance to the Allies, America must land 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 men in France as soon as it can be done and that at least 2,000,000 should be there before the end of the year. He advocated the placing of 5,000,000 men in training at once, and urged the utmost speed in the construction of airplanes and of ships. The General recommended the training of American troops in the principles of open warfare, as well as trench fighting.

check long enough for an orderly retirement."

By the sixth day the fighting had begun to assume less of the character of trench fighting and more of the character of that war of movement which the British and French have been trying to force upon the Germans from the beginning and which the Germans, of late, have been declaring themselves desirous of attaining.

On the seventh day of battle the Germans made desperate efforts to break through southwest of Roye, pressing attack after attack against the French along the whole front as far as Noyon. East of Montdidier the French were compelled to yield some ground. Elsewhere the enemy's violent assaults were completely checked. Montdidier is only 55 miles from Paris and in pressing the French back here the Germans have crossed the old line from which they retreated in 1917.

As this first seven days' fighting ended it was announced that the total British losses in killed, wounded and prisoners was little over 100,000. Estimates, based on

Among the Shrapnel-Makers

A Visit to One of Our Biggest Munitions Plants and the Wonderful Things One Sees There—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just returned from a visit to one of the largest munitions plants in the United States. It has been in existence since the war in Europe began, and has furnished hundreds of thousands of steel shells and many millions of shrapnel, which have been showered down on the Germans.

The great establishment was created almost in a night by one of the big industrial plants of the United States. The parent company had long been engaged in other work in iron and steel and it added this plant to satisfy the demand for munitions on the part of the Allies. It put up great buildings of glass and steel covering something like fifteen acres, and started thousands of men and women to work. Many of the men were expert machinists, and under the high wages offered they were soon turning out three-inch shells by the hundreds of thousands a month. The women were not skilled, but they were weeded out from the standpoint of efficiency, and today some of them surpass the men in certain branches of the manufacture. About one-fourth of the force is now made up of girls. There are 3,000 of them, and they are as regular, or even more regular, in their attendance than the 9,000 men who work with them. In many of the departments men and women work side by side.

I was interested in watching the women as they handled these deadly tools of destruction and death. There is nothing warlike about them. They are bright-eyed, healthy, rosy-cheeked girls, differing from the ordinary American industrial workers only in their costumes. This is a suit of khaki, consisting of a blouse and overalls. Many wear caps of the same material, which cover the whole of the head, excepting the face, over which a long visor falls.

AS to the different classes of work done by the women, these include the handling of intricate machinery and most of the processes employed in the making of shrapnel. I saw them pouring bullets into the steel shells, measuring them out in cups and passing them to men who pour in the melted resin, which holds the balls in place until they are ready to fly out in a leaden rain on the enemy. I saw them grinding the finest of machine tools, holding the tools against emery stones until their edges were shaped to exactly fit the gauges, which they applied now and then as the grinding went on. I saw girls measuring and gauging the size of the shrapnel, everything connected with which must be so accurate that it fits to a thickness one-third that of a single hair of your head. This means that almost every part must be measured and tested again and again as it goes through the process of manufacture. Women are experts in making such measurements, and they measure not only the steel shells which contain the bullets of the shrapnel, but also the brass containers behind, in which the powder is stored. They also make the primers, and measure out the powder of the shrapnel. I saw some who were weighing smokeless powder and putting it into the brass jackets. This work is dangerous. Each girl has her own little room on the ground floor, with safety doors so hung that they will burst open at a touch from the inside and allow her to fly into the open air. This is so of all the rooms where the powder and deadly explosives are handled; and no one is allowed to go in that part of the works who carries matches or anything that might create an explosion. The separate rooms are used so that if an explosion occurs in one room the fire may not get to the others before the inmates have had a chance to escape.

SHRAPNEL might be called the bullet of the most common field gun now used in our great war in Europe. It is employed by all of the armies, and since the war began it has been dropping balls of lead by the millions in an almost continuous rain over the war zone of Belgium and France. The German field artillery regulations say that it is by far the best projectile against all human targets which are not under cover, and the French have used it with terrible effect. It is the French type of shrapnel, the 75 millimeter, which is most largely used by the Allies, and the average shrapnel used today by all of the armies is of about the same diameter, namely about three inches.

The completed shrapnel, ready for putting into the gun, is a little less than three feet in length and about big around as a man's arm at the biceps. It consists of a steel shell, which is perhaps fifteen inches long, filled with lead bullets half an inch thick. The steel shell is the projectile. It does not burst during the firing. The range of a three-inch shrapnel shell is more than three miles. It goes out of the field gun at a speed of 1,900 feet per second, and flies from twenty-one to twenty-five seconds before it drops to the earth. When still flying, the fuse bursts forth, and the bullets pour out in a great cone covering a space about as long as a city block and as wide as the street in a furnace more than 1,900 degrees Fahrenheit. The forgings are punched out of billets of steel, the pressure on the end of the punch being about ten tons to the square inch. By means of these enormous pressures the metal is kneaded like dough into just the right shape.

This is only the beginning, however. The hollow, pipe-like forgings have to be made tougher and harder. They must be rounded off into a nose at the front end and cut by machinery to the exact shape and size of the gun. After this they are loaded with their wells of death and the fuses put in.

THE bullets which are put into the shrapnel steel shell are not of ordinary lead. They are a mixture of lead and antimony, which is harder than lead. They are not cast, but are pressed out of lead wire by machinery that will turn out 840 bullets a minute. Each bullet is a half-inch in diameter and they weigh about forty-one to the pound. There are between two and three hundred of these bullets in the shell chamber. They are sent forth by a charge of black powder in the base of the shell. They are packed around a tube which runs from the fuse at the front end of the shell to this powder, a wad of gun cotton plugging the pipe just over the powder. This gun cotton is terribly explosive. It looks just like cotton; but if a match touches it, it will go off in a flash or, if struck with a hammer it will blow you to pieces. As I looked at them putting the stuff into the shells the manager of the works told me how a rat ate up some not long ago and how his remains spattered all the surroundings.

SOME of the most interesting work on the shells is in connection with the long brass cartridge case which holds the smokeless powder that sends the shrapnel forth from the gun. These cartridges are of the same diameter as the shell and a foot or more in length. They are fitted onto the shells and they contain the explosive force that sends the projectile to the point where the bullets fly forth. These cases start as brass disks about as thick as a lead pencil and as big around as the bottom of a tin cup. They make their way through press after press which squeeze the brass into shape. A great steel finger from the bottom of the press touches the brass disk and pushes it out into a cone or cup as gently and as easily as you press your finger into a kid glove. The disks at first are thick cups; but they grow thinner and longer at each operation, until they become the beautifully shaped cylinders which hold the powder. They are now more than a foot long and their ends have been milled like the edge of a coin.

All this is intricate and hard to understand. But the fuse of the shrapnel is more intricate still. It is like putting a watch on the end of a cannon ball, and setting it so that when the ball flies for a certain distance through the air the explosives inside will go off. This is just what is done by the fuse of the shrapnel. It is a brass plug of the shape of a cone, which is screwed into the end of the shell. This plug contains such explosive machinery that a twist of the wrist on the part of the gunner will set within twenty-five seconds the time at which the explosives inside will go off. This is adjusted just before the shell is put into the gun, and it is timed according to the distance the projectile will be from the gun when the ignition occurs. At that time the explosive runs down the tube to the base of the shell, and sets off the black powder, which drives the bullets forth in a shower. The shower has a range of about 750 feet, and the gunner so times the fuse that the rain of lead envelopes the enemy.

THE black powder increases the velocity of the bullets about 300 feet per second over that of the shell. They fly out with such force that any one of them is capable of putting any man out of action who stands within some hundreds of feet of where the shell opens.

The number of shells of shrapnel made in this country is almost beyond computation. This is so not only of shrapnel, but of powder and explosives of all kinds. Before the war one company was making about 400,000,000 pounds of military powders per annum, another was turning out 800 twelve-inch shells per day, and a third making 600,000 loaded time fuses a month. The orders of the Allies ran into many hundreds of millions of dollars and it is said that almost $2,000,000,000 worth of war supplies were contracted for by J. P. Morgan & Co. alone.

The four types of shrapnel used on the battlefields of Europe running through it. The effect is to make of a single projectile a flying mine, which showers something like 300 bullets, any one of which can put a man out of the fight, and which covers a radius which is sixty or more feet in width and 750 feet long.

DURING its retreat from Belgium to Paris, the French army in one week fired about 900,000 rounds of shrapnel, and that shrapnel alone is said to have cost over $15,000,000. The amount being used on the western fronts is many times greater. The first shrapnel sent from America to France during this war cost something like $18 apiece. The cost is much greater today.

But come with me for a walk through this great munitions plant and see something of how these deadly projectiles are made. The great buildings are of two stories. They cover acres and are largely made of steel and glass. The walls are almost all glass and the shops are as light as day. They are of enormous size and each is a maze of machinery with men and women working at and among it. Every machine and every person is speeded to the fullest capacity.

The first thing made is the shell itself. This comes to the plant in the shape of forgings consisting of the finest and toughest of steel, which have been run through high-power forging machines, and reduced to the shape of rough iron pipe of about the same shape as the shell. This work is done under enormous pressure. Some of the machines for making the forgings exert a pressure of 240,000 pounds to the square inch, the metal having been previously heated

The New Liberty Loan Now Open

ON April 6 the third issue of the Liberty Loan was offered to the people of America. It was announced on March 25 that this loan would be for $3,000,000,000, that it would draw interest at 4½ per cent., and that bonds of the two previous issues could be converted into the bonds of the Third Liberty Loan. The bonds will also carry a provision for the creation of a sinking fund at 5 per cent. through the period of the war, and for one year thereafter. The convertible feature will end with these bonds, for they will not be exchangeable for bonds of later issues, but it is not expected that these issues will need to carry any high rate of interest. It was also announced that the Secretary of the Treasury would ask Congress for authority to issue bonds to the amount of $4,500,000,000 in addition to those now authorized in order to provide for future issues. The House passed the Liberty Loan Bill on March 30. The Bill authorizes the issuance of $8,000,000,000 in certificates of indebtedness, and $4,500,000,000 of Liberty Bonds in addition to the $3,666,000,000 now authorized but unissued, fixes the interest rate at 4½ per cent., and authorizes further loans of $1,500,000,000 to our Allies.

In announcing the loan Secretary McAdoo said: "I am sure that the people will respond to the Third Liberty Loan with the same loyalty and enthusiasm that characterized their support of the first two loans. The great events now happening in France must fire the soul of every American with a new determination to furnish all the dollars and all the material resources of America that are needed to put an end to the execrable atrocities of German militarism. Defeat faces the Kaiser and we must hasten it by asserting American might with increased vigor in concert with our gallant comrades."

The new Third Liberty Loan will be offered in the same denominations and on similar terms to those of the second. Bonds will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, and the instalment payments may be made 2 per cent. with the subscription, 18 per cent. in two weeks, 40 per cent. one month later, and the final 40 per cent. one month after that. It is probable that the banks will sell the $50 bonds on the basis of $1 a week as in the last Liberty Loan.

A Week in the World's News

SENATE TALKS SHIPS. In one of the bitterest debates the Senate has known since America's entry into the war Senator Lodge of Massachusetts and Senator Poinexter of Washington, on March 26, attacked the ship and airplane records of the Administration, while Senator Overman and Senator Hitchcock defended the Administration. Senator Lodge severely arraigned the Administration for failing to get more than one American airplane to its forces in France, and declared that out of all the fuss and furor over ships only two ships had as yet been put in service of the hundreds which were to be built. Senator New of Indiana astounded the Senate by declaring that of the 12,000 airplanes which the Aircraft Production Board had expected to build by July next only thirty-seven would be ready. Senator Hitchcock said that he had been assured that 2,000 airplanes would be ready for the American Army in France by July 1. Senator Poinexter criticized both the Aircraft Board and the Shipping Board for failure to take advantage of offers on the part of timber owners to furnish spruce, and on the part of corporations to build ships. When the debate was over and the atmosphere had cleared one fact stood out: that such mistakes as had been made and such failures as were admitted were being rapidly transformed into efficient performance. The attack on the Shipping Board, however, brought an answer from Chairman Hurley, in which he pointed out the handicaps which our shipping program had faced. He said that at the beginning of the war there were thirty-seven steel shipyards in America, and that since that time there had been located eighty-one new steel and wooden shipbuilding yards; eighteen of the original thirty-seven had been expanded. There are now building 235 new steel shipways, twenty-six more than exist

California builder had brought three 9,400-ton ships to completion at once. On March 1 there were 8,205,708 dead-weight tons of steel vessels under construction, of which 3,045,508 tons represented contracts with private parties, which had been taken over by the government. The whole program for steel ships was 28 per cent. complete on that day. 655,456 tons had been completed took part, recaptured from the Germans the city of Odessa, and also Kherson and Nikolayev, at the latter of which the Germans were said to have taken possession of 2,500 ships, including uncompleted dreadnoughts, submarines, destroyers and two cruisers, and a large number of merchantmen. Vienna on March 29 denied that Odessa had been lost. Ukraina is apparently awake to the menace to its own liberties contained in the presence of German troops within its borders. A request by the Rada to Germany to stop the advance of her troops in Ukraina was said to have been met by the reply that Germany had been invited to restore order, and could not leave until this was accomplished.

The German commanders have demanded the surrender by the Ukrainians of 85 per cent. of their grain and all of the sugar from their refineries, except that needed for local consumption. Peasants in different parts of Ukraina have risen to resist the German food requisition, and fighting is taking place.

FRENCH AMBASSADOR JOINS FRANCIS. Dispatches from Moscow, on March 24, stated that the French ambassador, on behalf of all the Allied diplomats stalled at Tammerfors, Finland, had applied to M. Joffe, Petrograd Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, through the Danish legation, for permission to return to Petrograd and proceed to Vologda, where the American embassy is now established. M. Joffe granted the desired permission, but said it seemed strange that Russia's allies should ask permission through neutrals to enter a friendly country. The Italian, Greek and Serbian legations were with the French ambassador at Tammerfors. The British chargé succeeded in reaching Sweden. The remainder of the British embassy was believed to be with the French. The Siamese and Brazilian legations and the Chinese and Japanese diplomats were with Ambassador Francis at Vologda. Trotzky was reported, on March 27, to have approached the Entente with a new proposition for the organization of military resistance to the Germans with Allied support. He was also reported, on March 26, to have asked for the return of John F. Stevens, head of the American Railway Commission, to assist in the reorganization of the Russian railway system.

EXPLOSION KILLS SEVENTEEN. It was announced on March 25 that an explosion of a depth bomb on board the American destroyer Manley in the war zone had resulted in the death of seventeen members of her crew, while seventeen others were missing and sixteen were injured. The explosion was the result of a collision between the destroyer and a British warship. The Manley made port. The American steamship Chattahoochee, formerly the Hamburg-American Liner Sachsen, was torpedoed and sunk in the war zone on March 25. The vessel was engaged in American army transport service.

THE CLASS OF 1918. The Senate on March 29 passed the bill providing for the extension of the Selective Draft Act to all men who have become twenty-one since June 5, 1917. The bill was sent to the House. The War Department has been delaying the call for the Second Draft pending the passage of this bill, which, it is estimated, will add 700,000 men to the number already registered. The Senate on the same day passed the bill, already passed by the House, to bring alien women under the regulations of the espionage act.

DRAFT RIOTS IN QUEBEC. Serious disorders, which were still in progress, were reported from Quebec on March 28, as a result of an attack by civilians upon a squad of police engaged in round-up deserters under the provisions of the Military Service Act. Militia quelled the riots after the office of the Quebec in all of England. He said that it took Germany forty years to build up her military machine, and that in less than eight months we had built up a shipbuilding machine which, when it goes into full swing, will defeat the military machine of Germany. He called attention to the fact that it had taken Henry Ford sixteen years to develop his enormous standardized production, and that it had taken the United States Steel Corporation twenty years to perfect an organization one-half as large as the Emergency Fleet Corporation. He also stated that the Skinner & Eddy Co. had launched an 8,800-ton vessel in sixty-four days from the laying of her keel, and that another

On March 27 Chairman Hurley made public his statistics in the shape of numbers of vessels completed, which showed a total of 188 vessels launched, of which 103 had been put in service; 3 of this 103 were ships contracted for by the Emergency Fleet Corporation since the beginning of the war, the other 100 being ships that had been ordered by private purchasers and were requisitioned by the government.

Hostess Houses at Work

By MARY ALDEN HOPKINS

A SPACIOUS room, beautiful with the dignity of simple lines and gay with chintzes. Big cushioned chairs pulled into informal circles. A double-faced fireplace showing on both sides laughing, roaring flames. Such are the Hostess Houses built and run by the Young Women's Christian Association in sixty-eight military centers in the United States.

Hostess Houses within are as alike as twins despite variations in contour and curtain colors. Only the eye of the Hostess knows them apart. You and I could not tell the house at San Antonio, Texas, where a hundred thousand soldiers do their shopping, from the house in Camp Zachary Taylor, Kentucky, where Illinois shakes hands with Indiana.

The windows of the cantonment houses look out upon similar landscapes of broken ground, treeless streets and wooden barracks. In Camp Doniphan, Oklahoma, they tell us dust lies a little thicker than elsewhere, but Camp Funston, Kansas, claims the deepest mud. In every camp all the weather of the state concentrates in the company street. Hospitality rushes to cover. Would you study the domestic life of the soldier? Choose the Hostess House for your observation post.

The reception-room is crowded with complacent khaki-putted legs, bright, perky Easter hats hatched at the beginning of Lent, muddled white kid shoes, bloated lunch bags growing thin, babies crawling under tables, a lad humming "They say we're going over the ocean," the rattle of knives in the cafeteria, an all-seeing hostess who appears to see nothing, laughter, low whispers, little jealousies and big kindnesses, furtive boredom, yawns, jokes, open love-making—and the white set face of a woman looking into the future.

The white-haired mother talking to her only son through his newspaper is protesting.

"But, dearie, don't the boys wear their rubbers at drill?"

The most wonderful man in khaki, sunning his boyish egotism in the ador-ing gaze of the prettiest girl in the universe, is explaining, finger by finger.

"I can count 'un,' 'deux,' 'trois,' but I'll be hanged if I can remember 'four'!"

The stout, blue-kerchiefed woman rolls despairing eyes at the alert young woman behind the information desk:

"My man, they give him uew 'Meri-

The more obvious social side of the houses is widely known: the occasional weddings, the constant family reunions, the corn popping over embers, the jolly music, and the quiet confidences. But only the hostesses know the black surge of finality against which struggle the women who smile so gayly. Out of the need of the soldiers' women folk has developed a social service for women, stretching from Camp Devens, Massachusetts, to Camp Kearny, California.

The Hostess Houses have been forced into a sort of social settlement work. A tubercular and penniless wife established herself in a Pacific camp on the chilly doorstep of the Personnel Department. A clinging vine accompanied by two offspring arrives in a Southern camp looking for a waitress's job. A romantic-eyed fiancée makes a long railroad journey to be with the beloved. What's to be done with them? A painted Jezebel can be thrust summarily out of camp accompanied by the military police, their eyes rolled piously upward. But a wife must be treated with respect.

"Take her to the Hostess House," orders the exasperated commandant, in as polite a tone as he can muster.

So the Hostess Houses have had to go into the social welfare business. Hostesses have not been supplied with red tape. No pigeon holes for "cases" exist. The solution of each problem must be found immediately.

Emergency secretaries are placed in some large camps to give their entire attention to these crises. Such a worker is a home-and-camp visitor. To her is turned over the sad duty of welcoming a hurriedly-summoned mother with the news of her son's death. She must persuade a giddy-pated child war bride to sit by the fire when her jealous husband's on duty. A frantic soldier turns to her to discover whether his vanished sister is lost, strayed or stolen. She must remove quietly from a barracks a wife gone quite mad with anguish. And somehow she must get back to their homes all the feeble mothers and bewildered wives who spend their last

If you really wish to Sherlock-Holmes which cantonment you happen to be visiting, having, we will assume, lost your memory between the railroad station and the house, here are some clues:

If a white-capped chef pops a smiling face out of the kitchen door to inquire, "How many's been served?" and if the Filipino bus boy clatters his tray onto a table, dashes to the front of the cash register and whoops back, "Eighteen hundred and six and what do you know about that!" returning to his tray on his hands in order to wave his feet exultantly, why then you recognize Camp Lewis, Washington State, where the help is reported to take an intelligent interest in the housework.

tions begging; "Meet me at the Hostess Houses where they keep the Home Fires Burning," refer specifically to the house at Camp Lee, but the description fits all the houses.

THE Government sanctions the building of these temples to domesticity. No cantonment gets one until the commanding officer sends to the National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association a formal written "please." Sixty-eight are in operation, under construction or authorized. Requests are still coming faster than they can be filled. The Hostess House Committee in New York meets weekly to say, "Yes," to impatient commandants. The Hostess House is the Good Fairy of the cantonment.

GERMANY in this war is allied with Turkey and Turkey's part in the war has been concerned principally with the massacre of Armenians. What Turkey has done has been told in the House of Lords of the English Parliament by Lord Bryce, formerly British Ambassador to America. He said:

"The massacres are the result of a policy which, as far as can be ascertained, has been entertained for some considerable time by the gang of unscrupulous adventurers who are now in possession of the Government of the Turkish Empire. They hesitated to put it in practice until they thought the favorable moment had come, and that moment seems to have arrived about the month of April. That was the time when these orders were issued, orders which came down in every case from Constantinople, and which the officials found themselves obliged to carry out on pain of dismissal.

"There is nothing in the precepts of Islam which justifies the slaughter that has been perpetrated. I am told on good authority that high Moslem religious authorities condemned the massacres ordered by Abdul Hamid, and these are far more atrocious. In some cases the governors, being pious and humane men, refused to execute the orders that had reached them, and endeavored to give what protection they could to the unfortunate Armenians. In two cases I have heard of the governors being immediately dismissed for refusing to obey orders. Others more pliant were substituted and the massacres were carried out.

"To give one instance of the thorough and remorseless way in which the massacres were carried out, it may suffice to refer to the case of Trebizond, a case vouched for by the Italian consul, who was present when the slaughter was carried out, his country not having then declared war against Turkey. Orders came from Constantinople that all the Armenian Christians in Trebizond were to be killed. Many of the Moslems tried to save their Christian neighbors, and offered them shelter in their houses, but the Turkish authorities were implacable. Obeying the orders which they had received, they hunted out all the Christians, gathered them together, and drove a great crowd of them down the streets of Trebizond, past the fortress to the edge of the sea. There they were all put on board sailing boats, carried out some distance on the Black Sea, and there thrown overboard and drowned. Nearly the whole Armenian population of from 8,000 to 10,000 was destroyed—some in this way, some by slaughter, some by being sent to death elsewhere."

This is a part of the record of Germany's ally—Turkey—in the war. Yet, it still remains to be said that of all the nations of the world Germany alone has made no protest against the Turkish massacres in Armenia in which it is estimated that 800,000 unoffending men, women and children have been murdered brutally in cold blood.

It is against this self-styled "cultured" nation, that sees no wrong in the massacre of an entire people, that America is fighting in this war for the liberty of the world. There is not an American who has the right to hold back in this great struggle from the aid his country demands of him.

The nation demands of every citizen that he shall save for his country's welfare.

Save labor and save money. Save labor in order that money may be saved.

Save money to lend to the Government to wage the war to a victorious issue.

There is only one investment today for the patriotic American and that is Liberty Bonds. It is by buying Liberty Loan Bonds that we lend our money to the Government, and it is the duty of every one to save to buy Liberty Loan Bonds that America may be victorious in the war, and that neither Germany nor any other nation may ever again be free to countenance such crimes as Turkey has perpetrated in Armenia in the name of Mittel Europa and German Kultur.

Liberty Bonds to Stop Massacres

Over the Top With the Stars of God

TEXT—Dan. 12:3. "They that be wise shall shine as the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."

THIS is prophecy. Here is the service flag in the Old Book. More than twenty-four hundred years ago it is described with great minuteness by a man of inspired vision.

The book of Daniel is a state paper, so to speak. It resounds with clashing armies, the noise of heaven's artillery, the collapse of mighty empires and the fall of thrones. But it ends with a shout of victory, and the ushering in of an era of peace and righteousness by a procession of service stars.

The text is from a chapter entitled, "The Last Things." We are now entering the era of last things. Wherefore I believe our soldiers are the embattled stars of Daniel's vision. Think of it! They play a part in the greatest chapter of history. The spotlight of prophecy and revelation is upon them. The centuries look down from the galleries. The boxes are filled with seers, apostles, heroes, martyrs. It is a moment of breathless suspense—a great act in the drama of human destiny. They that are stars shall shine.

Now, it is really quite remarkable that the identical symbol of Daniel's prophecy should have been thus chosen. Each star is a soldier. An unprecedented use of the star. Stars have long emblemized nations, colonies, states, official stations. But so far as I am aware, this is the first instance where man has been honored by a place in the starry field of a national flag. Is this chance? Is it coincidence? I doubt it. To my mind, we have in the flag before us a striking example of the unconscious harmony between the work of man and the plan of his Maker.

When I returned from the mountains last fall and saw so many of these service flags displayed throughout the city, my curiosity was greatly aroused. It was several days before I found any one who could even tell me the significance of the flag. None was able to enlighten me as to its origin. Did it originate with the government? No. Had Congress legislated it into being? No. Yet there it was, this flag of mystery, floating from residence, business house and church.

THEN came the surprising revelation that the emblem was born in a father's heart. In a moment of inspired patriotism, Captain R. L. Queisser, of the Fifth Ohio Machine Gun Company, conceived the idea. Says he, "The thought came to me that both my boys, who were officers in the Guard, would be called out, and I wondered if I could not evolve some design or symbol by which it might be known that they were away in their country's service, and which would be to their mother a visible sign of the sacrifice her sons were making."

Whence came this idea to Captain Queisser? I venture to believe that the source of the inspiration was the same as the source of Daniel's vision. The inspired are those who think God's thoughts after him. There is something so natural and normal about God's workings. The Divine purposes ripen so unostentatiously that one is sometimes tempted to question the fact of supernatural influence.

The designer was probably quite as unconscious of any divine leading as he was of the sweeping popularity of this invention of his heart. But what of that? It is doubtful if any who fulfil the great purposes of God realize at the time what they are doing. When King Cyrus liberated the captives of Babylon, and bade them return to their native land and rebuild Jerusalem, his motives were probably purely political. Nevertheless, he thereby fulfilled, to the letter, words spoken of him by the Hebrew prophets one hundred and thirty years before Cyrus was born and one hundred and fifty years before the Jews had become captives.

Certainly it is a service flag of which Daniel writes. Certainly, in America the Service Flag has made its first appearance. Therefore I conclude that these stars which turn many to righteousness must at least have some reference to the flag upon which we are looking, some message for soldiers before me in person or in spirit, some compensating hope for the relatives of those who have joined the colors.

Our soldier boys are the embattled stars in God's Service Flag. As such they take their stand on yonder firing line, beside Joshua, Gideon, David and men of like stature. A thrilling moment it should be when a young man steps from the monotony of private life into a world movement pulsating with eternal possibilities. To be a soldier in such circumstances is to be thrice armed, with inspiring vision, abiding faith, intrepid confidence.

After a memorable victory of democracy over militarism, long, long ago, a poetess composed an immortal song celebrating the battle, in which occurs the line:

"The stars in their courses fought against Sisera."

Sisera was the war-lord of his day. Whether Deborah's allusion is to the prowess of General Barak's soldiers, or to some unusual astronomical influence which turned the tide of battle, I am unable to say. The words may embody a bit of poetic fancy. Or they may record a prevailing belief that supernatural influences nerved the patriotic endeavors of her countrymen in that unequal grapple between unprepared idealism and military efficiency. Be that as it may, we know this much at least: the men who followed Barak went forth as champions of a great ideal, to stamp out the barbarism of a mad imperialism. And they did it. Somewhere in America a modern Deborah, at this moment, is tuning her harp that some day she may sweep its strings and sing of our Service Flag. "The stars in their courses fought against Germany."

THERE is an even more striking resemblance between Daniel's service flag and our own. Both stand for righteousness. "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever." Surely, two parallelisms in one brief text could hardly be mere coincidence.

Righteousness! When did America send her soldiers into battle with that particular word upon their lips and graven upon their hearts? Not conquest, empire, nationalism, or defense, is the word of rousement. Not even liberty, fraternity, equality. The challenge of the hour is "Righteousness." It strikes at the very root of the disease of which all the other words are symptoms of either decline or recovery. "Remember the Maine" was vengeful. "Righteousness" is ennobling.

This is an unusual, I may almost say, an unprecedented battle cry. Truly heaven hath inspired both the starry emblem and the new purpose of which the Service Flag is symbol and sign.

Righteousness! Could there be a more inspiring word for a moment of supreme dedication? Could a loftier note be struck? Is there a chord in the human heart more soulful, more uplifting, than the one upon which we are now playing? Might it be that America has found the lost chord of which Sir Arthur Sullivan sings so poignantly? Is this the "Grand Amen" (so be it) that came from the soul of the Infinite One and enters into ours? Who knows? We can but hope that it is.

We take up the gauntlet and draw the sword with righteous indignation set aflame by the long, indisputable record of vows broken and barbarities practiced by the enemy. Our hearts have been steeled for this gruesome task by the perfidy and intrigue of false friends. Our purpose is made resolute by the memory of Belgium, the Lusitania, and Edith Cavell.

The Happiness Road

IT'S only just a little road,
The road that leads
To happiness. It's made of faith
And kindly deeds;

Of pleasantness, of words that bless,
Of thoughts that heal;
Of very silent giving up
For others' weal.

The road that leads to happiness
Is easy taking;
Beside it grass springs fresh and green,
And buds are breaking.

Oh, there are folks from far away,
And folks we know there.
So let us two take hands some day,
And oh, let's go there!

Mary Carolyn Davies

THESE are stirring and inspiring thoughts for this occasion. There must be no misgivings, no uncertainty as to the justice of our cause, or the ultimate outcome of the service we are about to render. We are on the winning side because it is God's side. It was Thomas Carlyle who declared that righteousness is nature's own law; in that direction move all the tendencies of the universe, and they cannot be conquered.

The Central Powers boast that tyrants are secured upon their thrones by the favor of God. But that is not true, because it is not righteous. They tell us that nations are born to be ruled by a superior nation. But that is not true, because it is not righteous. They loudly proclaim from the housetop that might is right. But that is not true, because it is not righteous. God and righteousness are synonymous throughout the Bible. So I do not hesitate to affirm most dogmatically that America is on God's side in this war.

What have I to say of Germany's claim that God is on her side? Simply this: It is not true. Her every plan and effort in the war thus far has been in the opposite direction from that in which the tendencies of nature and God are moving. She is battling against a current of influences destined to grow broader, deeper, and more swift as they near the confluence of designs human and divine.

Furthermore, there is a vast difference between "Myself and God" and "God and myself." To the German mind, God is an appendage to human foresight and efficiency. With Americans, the thought is different. We take upon our lips the words with which Gideon and his little company of three hundred went forth to meet the hosts of Midian: "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

Thousands upon thousands of our young men have already joined the colors, and more are mobilizing. I know the spirit of these men and the motives that actuate them. It is not too much to say of them that they are entitled, by every preparation of mind and heart, to a place in the starry field of such a service flag as Daniel has described. And I have reason to believe that what I say for our own soldiers is equally true of the rank and file of that vast Allied army at the front.

In fact, the American contingent which is now overseas has given noteworthy evidence of the holy purpose for which the Service Flag stands. Stacy Aumonier, a British writer, read it in the faces of our boys as they recently marched through Trafalgar Square. "They came, marching in fours, the vanguard of Uncle Sam's army. They were solemn, bronzed men, loose of limb, hard and strong, with a curious set expression of purpose."

"Tramp! Tramp! Tramp! Tramp!"

"And they looked neither to the right nor to the left; nor did they look up or smile, or apparently take any notice of the cheers we raised. We strained forward to see their faces, and we cried out to them our welcome. Fully a thousand men passed in this solemn procession."

THERE is a delightful little story of a Boston miss which conveys so beautifully the thought I have been seeking to impress that I tell it at this point: This little girl was gazing upward from a southern window as night came on, and noting resplendent Venus in the sky, she ran to the door of another room and called, "Mamma, Mamma, come quick and see! God's hung out his service flag and it has one star in it."

When I read this incident, my mind went back to the time when God raised the window of heaven and, leaning far out, spread a wondrous service flag with one dazzling star upon Bethlehem's sky, because of his interest in the cause of Righteousness. And I seemed to discern, with new and unusual clearness, the mission of God's only begotten Son, as also the highest mission of the sons of men. If Righteousness be sincerely our goal, then the service which we are now rendering must make us co-laborers with God; and sometime, somewhere upon the field of conflict, we shall surely meet with Jesus, the Captain of the world's salvation, the King of Righteousness.

Ye sons of brave sires, if ye be as noble as they, and worthy of the inheritance whereof ye boast, baptize your souls in the spirit of pure service which this flag emblemizes; then, rising from knees of dedication, go over the top with the Stars of God.

The Place of Unveiling

SUNDAY, April 14. Col. 1:10. "That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God." First of all we see a pilgrim on a journey, keeping to the appointed path with vigilant fidelity. Then we see his spirit illumined as by some mystical dawn. An inward light appears "which keeps the way before him always bright." He enters into a fuller knowledge of God. And the matter to notice is this—the revelation comes to him on the road. The holy light meets the traveler. We do not talk ourselves into the knowledge of the Lord; we walk into it. We start out for something, we venture upon some errand, we accept some commission of Christian service, and the enlightening ministry joins us on the road, and we become light in the Lord. "Light is sown for the righteous," and they reap the shining harvest as they go along the way. We "walk worthy of the Lord," and we thereby "increase in the knowledge of God." Yes, we walk into the larger day.

But there are great differences in the walkers, and therefore there are great differences in the measures of their spiritual knowledge and enlightenment. Mr. Fearing and Valiant-for-truth were both on the same road, and they were going in the same direction, but what a contrast in the style of their walking! Valiant-for-truth had a fine stride as he swung along the road in purpose and song. Mr. Fearing was nervous and tremulous, uncertain about the Lord's promises, and uncertain about the divine provision. The character of our walk has much to do with our enlightenment. Valiant-for-truth was on the lookout for opportunities of service. His road was to him an unending series of possible doors. Mr. Fearing was looking for traps, and snares, and pitfalls! And so while Valiant-for-truth stepped forward into an ever-brightening dawn, Mr. Fearing trudged along in perpetual twilight.

But if we are to walk into the light our walk must not only be one of obedience, it must be one of communion. We must not only walk in love, we must walk with God. And in this traveling companionship we can both speak and listen. We must neither be deaf nor dumb. The great Companion, who walked with the two disciples to Emmaus, listened to them as they told him their disappointments and fears; and they listened to him as he talked with them by the way. And as they walked and talked their hearts began to glow with a strange burning. "Did not our hearts burn within us?" And then the burning changed into a shining, and they knew him: he was made known unto them in the breaking of bread. Walk and know!

Our Most Difficult Lesson

MONDAY, April 15. 11 Cor. 12:10. "I take pleasure in infirmities." Life is full of disagreeable incidents, but it is possible to rise above them. Paul said, "I have learned to be content." Where did he learn that lesson? Was it not of One who endured all things—the contradiction of sinners, the shame of the cross, counting it joy that he might fulfil his ministry? We have much yet to learn from Christ. We have to learn how to suffer and grow strong, how to smile when the heart is heavy, how to hope when the heart is breaking.

Much depends upon the cause or the person for whose sake we suffer the disagreeable. Many a woman cooks for her own family who would not so cheerfully enter the domestic service of another household. Many a mother acts as nurse to her own children who could not be induced to perform the same service for strangers. It makes all the difference in the world for whose sake we serve and suffer. Let us be convinced that the Master calls us to lowly service and we will engage in it with exceeding joy. Who of us would not feel honored to wash his feet, to gird ourselves with humble raiment that we might wait on him? Well, he wants us to do our duty, whether it be agreeable or obnoxious, and by so much as we do it cheerfully, we are serving him. This consideration alone is sufficient to lead us to accept the unpleasant tasks of life. They are means of self-discipline, and they are a part of "the King's business." C. C. A.

Godly People

TUESDAY, April 16. Ps. 12:1. "Help, Lord; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men." The passing away of righteous men from a community is to be regarded as a public calamity, because such men interpose themselves as a wall between their wicked fellowmen and the avenging justice of God. God hears the intercession which his children make for the sins committed by others in their time and place. Abraham's pleading that the judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah might be stayed secured the rescue of Lot. During the rebellion of Korah the fervent prayer of Moses and Aaron turned the wrath of God from the whole congregation of Israel. On another occasion Moses sought to turn the eyes of God from the stubbornness and wickedness of the Israelites and asked him to remember his servants Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. For his own sake "and for his servant David's sake" God defended Jerusalem during a siege. By Ezekiel he told the Jews in captivity: "I sought for a man among them, that should make up the hedge and stand in the gap before me for the land, that I should not destroy it; but I found none. Therefore I have poured out my indignation upon them." What a valuable asset, then, are righteous, godly people to a city or a country! They win favor for a whole land. For their sake God mitigates his judgments and even spares their wicked fellowmen. When God prepares to smite an apostate race in his anger, he frequently removes the faithful. The pious ancestors of Noah had all departed before the flood came. Bearing these facts in mind, we can well understand why David can view the demise of pious people in his day with alarm. Our departing saints are, indeed, in no danger: they are going home to their rest and their reward. But we who are remaining behind are feeling the loss which we are incurring through their home-going. That loss is not confined to their immediate dependents, but to the whole age in which they had been living.

Forgiveness

WEDNESDAY, April 17. Rom. 5:8. "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." A mother, driven from her home by an unfeeling landlord, perished in the mountain snows of Scotland. In a sheltered nook, wrapped in the mother's clothes, her little child was rescued. The boy never forgot the story of his mother's love, but he did forget the love of Christ, who died for him while he was a sinner. It is therefore Christlike to risk one's life to save an enemy from perishing. Can you pray for those who spitefully use you and persecute you? Jesus did, for his crucifiers. Can you do good to them who hate you? The heavenly Father sendeth his sun and his rain on the evil and the unjust. Can you forgive men their trespasses against you as God forgives you? If you can, you will save yourself and may rescue the lost.

The hand of forgiveness and the spirit of love are the only influences that can break down the prison doors of hatred and rescue the prisoner. The sun, with its gentle rays of light and warmth, is more powerful than lightning, earthquake or volcano. It is the sun of divine love that gives life to the soul garden more than any other forces. Dying in the trenches or on the battle-field for one's country is heroic, but dying to save the soul of your enemy is a loftier moral pinnacle. It is Calvary reaching into the heavens of splendor. One must never hate people but ever abhor, as you would a wild beast, evil actions, a wicked spirit and devilish designs. Even though a human face has become the portrait of a terrible monster within, yet Jesus died to cast the devil out.

Who Are the Saints?

THURSDAY, April 18. Rom. 1:7. "Beloved of God, called to be saints." The non-religious and the unreligious world greatly err in their idea of the meaning of the word "saint." Thoughtless people imagine that the term is applicable only to those who are faultless. Such is not the New Testament sense of the word, as students of the Scriptures well know. One who is far from perfect may be a saint—he is simply not a perfect saint. Perhaps the best thing that can be said about the most faithful Christian is that he is "called to be a saint," and that he is endeavoring to follow his calling.

When a child enters school he is "called to be a scholar," but scholarship lies more in the spirit of his quest than in his attainment of it. We do not scorn the claim of a very imperfect scholar, provided he be willing to study, that is to say, obedient to his high calling.

Professor John R. Slater, in his study of Browning, gives us a significant phrase, "the glory of the imperfect." Because Browning saw the glory of the imperfect he is the supreme religious poet of our day. He knew that no man is what he is at any one time, but rather that he is judged in heaven's light by what he is compared with what he was. God does not demand angelic perfection in human character, but he does expect that we shall daily be "going on to perfection."

Opportunity

FRIDAY, April 19. Est. 4:14. "If thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" The thought here uttered is the gist of the teaching of the book of Esther. If there had been no other purpose why this remarkable book was written, this one would suffice. Mordecai beholds the Jewish race in dire straits in Persia, where they were exiles. But he is not dismayed; even amidst the most immediate and imminent danger he is certain of the deliverance of his people. He is troubled only about one thing, viz., that his relative Esther might not recognize the grand opportunity afforded her by being elevated to the station of the king's consort, to render assistance to her suffering people in their dire necessity. God has placed Esther so close to the king that she is able to thwart all the cunning machinations of the king's wicked counselors. Perhaps that was the very reason why God permitted this humble Jewish maiden to become the Persian queen. God has made it possible for her to render most distinguished service to the covenant race. If through fear or indolence or pride she should fail to render that service, she will injure only herself. Faithless to her trust, she will be cast aside by God as a worthless tool, and he will find him another agent for effecting the salvation of his people. He is unlimited in his resources. If the prophet will not obey him, he will make a dumb beast put the prophet to shame. If men will not proclaim his goodness, he can make stones cry out and deliver his messages. No one can ever become so great and wise and powerful that God could not dispense with his service. But no one to whom God has opened up an opportunity for usefulness can afford to let that opportunity slip. By his failure to respond to God's call he does not only lose merit, but he incurs actual guilt. He is hiding his talent in the earth, and sorry will be his reckoning.

From Dust to Splendor

SATURDAY, April 20. Isa. 61:3. "To give them beauty for ashes." The beautiful life of holiness rises out of the ashes of sin at the touch of Jesus. "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree." Instead of a burnt-out soul, a palace of splendor; instead of a branded brow, a garland of beauty—a diadem of glory; instead of death, a risen life. The pathway back to God is from the dust and ashes of the desert of sin to the splendors of peace in Christ. How can immortals sit in the solitude and misery of an ash-heap when they may become the children of the King? Which will you have, the transient or the permanent, the momentary or Christ's eternal legacy of praise and blessing? One prayed for a friend, "May you be with the rich on earth and with the poor in the world to come," but we cannot serve two masters; we must choose beauty or ashes, the oil of joy or mourning, the garment of praise or the spirit of heaviness, ashes and sackcloth or royal robes of whiteness that brush the streets of gold.

O for the true, the beautiful and the good, not the false, ugly and evil!

He who has made everything beautiful in its season in nature produces more transcendent loveliness in soul ornamentation. He can remove the daubs of sin and Satan, bringing out the original glory of the Divine image in the human personality till mortals become worthy of a place alongside the angelic and saintly in the realm of immortals.

The Moral Offensive

WITH the great German offensive against the British lines in France comes the opening gun of America's great moral offensive against the Hun. This arrives in the shape of Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo's announcement of the Third Liberty Loan.

The advance of the German hordes in France may be minimized, when it is considered that such a proceeding is a mere single act in a great drama that is yet to be wholly played out. There is a very old saying that a single swallow does not make a summer; likewise, a single victory does not make lasting success in a war. Even this advance of the Germans cannot properly be called a victory, for, up to this time, the British lines remain unbroken. The fighting has merely shifted from one front to another and in a month or a week it may shift again. That is what the American troops are in France for, and that is why, before the summer is ended, many more American troops will land in France.

It is known that Germany laid up thousands of tons of material to make her drive possible, and to do this she had to raise enormous sums of money. The extent to which Germany can carry on war, after her many reverses and checks, should bring poignantly home to every American the necessity for funds for our own military establishment. Superior equipment and plenty of ammunition are necessities in this war, and assurance must be given to our troops that they will get them. They must be made to feel that all America is behind them, wholeheartedly supporting them in this war, which must have but one conclusion.

We must dedicate ourselves to the obvious duty that faces us, the supreme sacrifice until the long awaited moment arrives when the great bells in all our cities ring for peace. Man has climbed too far to slip back into the slough of darkness.

FROM primitive days, man has advanced with uplifted forehead, feeling a light on his face and vaguely seeing a wavering dream before him. Even the most savage of men in ancient days were not wholly dead to the spiritual voices that called to them to rise in the night and seek the lovely day. Their savagery was tinged with a realization of spiritual concepts that science seems to have removed from certain people who stand in places of power today.

The cruelty of the Hun far outweighs that of the early savage races. Their cruelty came from ignorance. It was their method of clinging to life; might was right in those days. But the Hun knows better. He possesses all the fruits of civilization, yet he wilfully chooses to follow a road that can lead only to destruction. This is the method of a people who have calmly and dispassionately weighed good and evil, and reasoned that evil was more advantageous to their material success. The world refuses to believe this and there is but one way to test the argument. Both evil and good must fight it out, as they have always fought it out since the dark hosts of Lucifer assaulted heaven and since Satan appeared to Christ upon the lofty mountain-top. For a time evil may seem to have the advantage; but this is but for the moment. Good must eventually triumph, for it seems to be a law of nature that that which is worth while endures, while the meretricious things perish. History bears this out and there is not an autocracy in any really enlightened land today. Certainly Germany, Austria-Hungary and Turkey cannot be called enlightened lands. We once thought the first two were such, but time has shown our grievous error. The Teutonic people have much to learn. Perhaps the chiefest thing they have yet to learn is democracy.

Teaching another people is a terrific task and often it seems to be impossible. Argument seldom convinces an antagonist, but sometimes it gives him food for thought and eventually he reasons out the thing for himself, arriving at new conclusions totally at variance with the old.

SUCH must be the way with the German people. The idea of a sudden revolution convulsing that country appears to be rather remote, for the German proletariat is constantly fed on false hopes aroused by the Russian debacle. This was to them a great victory, and it has been exaggerated by the military caste. The drive on the Western front will also be over-emphasized. For instance, half a dozen Americans are defeated by several hundred Germans during a scouting affair. The incident will be doctored up so as to appear like a great victory for the German people.

In this way the unrest in Germany is kept in check, and the deluded people continue to follow their false gods.

This is the crust of delusion that must be broken through, and while quite often a military victory will not do it, a moral triumph will succeed. Each Liberty Loan that America issues successfully is a moral triumph. There have been two of these and, while the Germans scoffed at them, there is no doubt that their effect was fatal to the absolute unification of Germany's population. There is unrest in Germany, although the censors strive zealously to conceal it. There have been strikes there, and there will be more as the war goes on. The German people cannot hold out forever, and this must never be lost sight of. The Third Liberty Loan comes as another moral blow that will help disintegration of the Kaiser's plans.

In speaking of disintegrating factors, it must not be assumed the Third Liberty Loan will greatly affect the German people. Indeed, it is doubtful if the fighting men on the front ever hear of the loan. Still, its effect will reach them in the resistance of thousands of American troops buoyed up by the fact that a united people stands behind them, giving them guns and ammunition, courage and confidence. Even the Germans who are in the cities and may receive news of the Third Liberty Loan will not immediately demand peace. The moral effect of the loan will be deeper than that.

IT will act as a lever for the thought of many people, turning over old shibboleths based upon fallacies and clearing the way for new thought. As in an argument one is not immediately convinced, but goes away pondering over certain doubts that have been aroused and so eventually arrives at a new aspect of the problem involved, so the Third Liberty Loan will come to the German people. They will dismiss it for the moment with an off-hand gesture, but it will plant the seeds of troubling thought and in many minds will come to full fruition.

A few German thinkers will consider world affairs more deeply from the impress left by a successful Liberty Loan, and thought is ever contagious. The unrest will spread still further that unrest which already manifests itself in the interior of Germany, and so the thought of the German people will gradually assume a new tinge.

No one believes or attempts to prove that the Third Liberty Loan is the single factor that will cause new thought to awaken in the German people. It is but one factor, but it is a very great one.

The success of this loan must be assured. There must be no doubt of its complete success, for Germany is waiting and watching. America is in the war solidly to combat the nefarious aims of the German rulers, and the Third Liberty Loan will prove to be another manifestation of the unity of the American people. For the sake of the future, this loan must go through successfully.

Buy Liberty Bonds, preach Liberty Bonds, pray Liberty Bonds! With a clear conscience and a good heart, let us press forward, holding nothing back. Our dear ones at the front are offering their lives for the cause of righteousness and justice. If we denied them our fullest support in the greatest of struggles we would be unworthy of the name of Americans. Buy Liberty Bonds and help them to win the war!

Help for Country Schools

MRS. MARY C. C. BRADFORD, president of the National Education Association, proposes a program for better rural schools and asks Federal aid to the extent of $140,000,000. This program would be worked out, according to her plan, in ten years, one-tenth of the proposed money being spent each year, the government to cooperate with the state and county.

Mrs. Bradford's program would have the Federal government spend as much as the state government to improve rural schools. It provides that it shall not go into effect until June, 1921, proposing that in the intervening three years the United States Bureau of Education wage a campaign to educate the country to the need of better rural schools. It proposes that Congress appropriate to the Bureau two hundred thousand dollars to carry on this propaganda work. The general scheme is to reduce the number of rural schools in the country by consolidation and to provide each rural schoolroom with a professionally trained teacher.

The great mistake in American rural education has been that we have educated our boys and girls away from instead of toward the farm. In many sections the rural school term is less than three months each year, and there are thousands of rural schools with such poor daily attendance, such short school terms and such poorly qualified teachers as to make them unworthy of the name of school.

The Kaiser and "Frightfulness"

IT is stated that the German Kaiser, while in the battle area recently during the great offensive, was deeply impressed by the terrible devastation.

Well might the war-crazed monarch be appalled at the results of his efforts at world-conquest. Viewing the smoking ruins of what had once been towns and cities, and the great heaps of unburied German dead lying where they had fallen, the Emperor said to Gen. Ludendorff: "How glad we should be that our country has been spared such terrible things. When mankind changes, these things also will change; but first mankind must begin to change."

Not a single regret for the countless thousands of his subjects who had fallen, but rather an expression of gloomy satisfaction that the thing happened where the German people could not see the horror of it—the wholesale slaughter of their kindred, as victims of his insane ambition for conquest. Truly "frightfulness" must be kept from the eyes of Germany at whatever cost. It was the vandal spirit that prompted the utterance—that same spirit which inspired the outrages on the defenseless Belgians, which justified the barbarities in Poland, and which is now celebrating "an orgy of rapine" in Lithuania.

We believe in God, in divine justice, and in the ultimate triumph of right over wrong. This war will be won by the union of all the forces of right, with Omnipotence guiding.

Our Just Cause Must Win

MILITARY experts tell us that we are again at a crisis in the war. The enemy is exerting his full force, and is met with brave resistance. The net result of the gigantic battling in Picardy cannot be foretold, it may or may not be decisive. If the enemy loses here, he still has other fighting fronts; if he gains here, then the war will go on until those gains are overcome and more.

As to the great battle now raging the condition is far better than it may appear on the surface of the reports. All the tremendous force of combined enemy resources, together with their advantage of careful preparation and favorable start, has failed, after more than a week of struggle, to achieve any decisive objective. The British army in an orderly falling back to new positions is losing nothing in strength of resistance, or morale, while its ability to make a counter-attack at the proper moment is not to be doubted. Lloyd George's ringing appeal to America to get reinforcements across the Atlantic in the shortest space of time, means to us only that it is not for England and France alone to fight off the avalanche of barbarism.

To our own people, this battle is peculiarly significant in that it is America's baptism in the war. We have gone in to do whatever part falls upon us, even though it becomes the leading part. Our entrance has clarified the real issue, and it is an issue which inspires manhood everywhere to fight to victory.

In the light of our President's noble utterances it is clearly seen that this world war, itself, great as it is, is a conflict not of men only but of ideas, not of nations merely but of abiding principles. We no longer look for peace, nor will accept it, along the lines of mere restorations of wrongs or allotment of territory, seeing now that these would only be concessions to a condition that is a constant threat to all that is just, and a constant restraint upon all that is righteous in human relations.

Upon the one hand is the principle of human rights and the promise of a world safe for democracy, and on the other hand is the arrogant principle of State organization founded on fraud and force.

This is the issue, and the battle now raging is but another and more stupendous phase of the old struggle, a struggle as ancient and inevitable as the thirst for power and the love of liberty, a struggle in which men have sacrificed and died in millions all the way from Sodom to Picardy.

This cause can suffer reverses but it cannot know defeat. Wrong carries within itself the germ of failure, the rot of dissolution.

To compromise is to betray the cause of civilization. We have put our hands to the task and will not turn back. Our hearts are in it and we cannot falter. Our souls are set upon it and we shall not fail.

He who never thinks of his friends will soon have no friends of whom to think.

Wife His Other Half

IRVING BACHELLER, in an article in the American Magazine for April, entitled "The Rungs in My Little Ladder," shows what value failures often are; that a business failure of his that left him poor in middle life had turned him suddenly into authorship and into a happy, useful and prosperous career. In recounting his helps in the literary world, he says this of his wife: "The best of these many friends has been my wife, whose faith in me and whose courage and affection in trying days have never failed, and who has ever been my frankest critic. Better than anything in my books is this candle of love and faith which burns in our home." This is a just tribute that most men could pay to their wives. Woman's hand is delicate, but very strong in helping a man over obstacles and up the hill of life. Her love has much to do in making him great. Woman's character, helpfulness, and affection are the rungs in the ladder over which many men have climbed to business and professional success. Some wives are handicaps that hinder success or bring positive failure to their husbands; but the rule is that wives are invaluable aids. They are the man's other half. This element of helpfulness to the husband is according to the divine thought thus expressed: "And the Lord said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a helpmeet for him." (Gen. 2:18)

Sawing Down Trees

THE Forest Department of the city of Berlin has just tested a new device for felling forest trees which they have pronounced a success. It is a chain saw driven by a motor about ninety pounds in weight. In its trial in the Grünewald forest it cut through the trunk of a tree thirty inches in diameter in two minutes. The motor will run ten hours on a little over a pint of gasoline. The machine will not only saw down the tree, but will also cut it up into pieces very quickly. It is a question whether nature or human economy will welcome this little, swift tree-killer. Our forests have been slain so mercilessly that public opinion and law have called a halt, and have rather demanded that new trees be planted and the dismantled forests restored. Nature has avenged the butchery of the trees in bringing drought and sterility. The Hebrews had no chain saws with motors, but they had the iron ax with which they felled their forest trees. There is this reference to it: "For one cutteth a tree out of the forest, the work of the hands of the workman, with the ax." (Jer. 10:3.)

Northern Potato Seed

FOR years it has been the aim of potato-growers to plant only "northern grown" seed. The supposition has been that potatoes grown in a colder climate were more hardy and vigorous in germination than those grown where it is warmer. Tennessee growers sent to Ohio, and Ohio to Wisconsin, and Wisconsin to Canada, for seed. Virginia farmers sent to New Jersey, and Long Island and Pennsylvania sent to Maine for their seed potatoes. Now, it seems that the reason for the superiority of northern seed was not a matter potato farmers in America gave as one of the reasons of his large yield and fine quality the fact that he grew his own seed every year, planting it July 1 and letting the frost get the vines and cut short the maturing of the seed, which was then about the size of a hen's egg. The transportation of northern seed and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." (Gen. 8:22.)

Eagles Fighting Aviator Killed

CAPTAIN MORTUREAUX, a pilot in the French Aviation Service, arrived in Paris on furlough from Salonica recently, bringing with him two stuffed eagles which he had shot down with his gun when they attacked him during a flight he made over the Bulgarian lines in Macedonia. This is said to be the first case in the record of European aviation when a bird attacked an airplane. The fight between the eagles and the aviator was witnessed by British and French troops in the advanced trenches over which the contest was fought. The soldiers picked up the two dead eagles as they fell from the clouds and gave them to Captain Mortureaux as trophies. One is a male, the other, the larger, a female. They measured nearly ten feet from wing to wing tip, and stood over four feet in height. These eagles did not see any reason why a thing that looked like an airplane should have any business in the territory which as king and queen they had ruled with such undisputed authority, and they resented the intrusion. They had such sharp, strong beaks and such powerful claws and were so fond of meat, that they concluded to make a mess on the French captain. As they have no difficulty in overtaking and killing an antelope and devouring it, they did not hesitate to attack the birdman; and if he had not had his gun handy he might have suffered serious injury. Through all time the eagle by his swiftness, keen eye, courage, power and persistence in fight, has been the symbol of the hero in battle; and from time immemorial until now soldiers have worn the wing of an eagle or something made like it as a badge of courage, of determination to win in battle; and honored, patriotic, and heroic orders have called themselves eagles of one sort or another. The Bible has much to say about this king of birds, this sovereign of the upper air. There is this mention of its high flight, and home, and search for its prey: "Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high? She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock. . . . From thence she seeketh the prey." (Job 39:27-29.)

Finger Prints Detect Crime

MARKED decrease in crime is credited to the finger print system by Magistrate McAdoo of New York. He said: "Finger printing has been in operation since 1910, during which time 129,555 impressions have been made without a successful attack on their reliability, thus proving that the marks on the fingers of each human being have an individuality of their own." Nature is against wrong. The very tips of the fingers testify to a man's crime. The Scripture expresses this truth: "Be sure your sin will find you out." (Num. 32:23.)

Smashed False Weights and Measures

THE authorities of Alameda County, California, in their crusade captured 4,800 false scales and measures of metal and 11,800 milk bottles under size and piled them up on the court-house lawn in a heap weighing several tons. Officers of the state and county Bureau of Weights and Measures took huge sledge hammers and smashed the lying machines into a thousand pieces. In the scrap heap there were 600 pounds of brass, 100 pounds of tin, 1 ton of wrought iron, and 1½ tons of cast iron. The whole junk pile was sold at public auction for $292.50, and the bottles brought $25 as old glass. Those thieves who juggled the machines, so that they gave light weight and short measure, should be under double contempt for robbing the people in war time, when it is so hard for the ordinary man to meet living expenses. The climax of villainy was reached when with bottles too small they stole milk from the babies. A man in the underworld, when he wants to describe the meanest man he knows, says "he would take candy from a child." The child can do without candy but not without milk. If the gaffly men can be caught they ought to send them up for a long term for starving the babies. It is estimated that $382,000 was saved to the families by the discovery of the fraud in the size of the milk bottles alone. This false weight and measure business is going on all over the country. It will be well for the authorities to awake to the fact and imitate the officers of Alameda County. We are told how sorely displeased the Almighty is with false weights and measures. "A false balance is abomination to the Lord; but a just weight is his delight." (Prov. 11:1.)

of climate at all, except that the short season and early frost cut down the vines before the tubers had matured, and that such potatoes not fully matured were more virile and prolific than the ones matured by a longer season. In a recent lecture at Columbia University, Professor Frank J. App, of the New Jersey College of Agriculture, said that "northern seed" could be home-grown in any of the potato-growing states by planting seed the first of July and letting the frost kill the vines before the tubers matured and keep them over to plant in the spring. And one of the most prosperous
